I have nothing further to say in the opening of the debate on the question, but will reserve my time until I have heard from the opponents of the bill. After consultation with the friends of the Indian and Mexican soldiers, I have concluded it to be the better course to separate the soldiers of the different wars, and permit the interest of each to stand upon their own respective merits. I am heartily in favor of a bill pensioning the soldiers of the Black Hawk war, in which war two Presidents participated—President Taylor and President Lincoln. I am also in favor of granting pensions to the soldiers who served in the Florida wars, and shall advocate pensions for them when their bill comes before us for action. I repeat again, the present bill makes provision solely for the Mexican soldiers, and for the simple reason that it is better for the interests of the soldiers of these various wars that the pension bills for their relief should not be confused or embarrassed by embracing them all in the same measure.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time until I have heard from those who are opposed to this bill; and I will say that I do not wish my time to be consumed in answering questions.

How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes left.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question touching one clause introduced in this bill for the first time—that which makes the following condition:

Or engaged in any battle——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In the Mexican war.

Mr. KASSON. I do not see its connection, and would like to ask the gentleman what it is proposed to accomplish by it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will explain. This bill, as the gentleman will perceive, is confined to those who served for sixty days in the Mexican war or actually participated in the war or actually served with the Army and Navy or engaged in a battle during the war. Now, there are instances where soldiers were enlisted for this war who did not serve sixty days, who were never in Mexico, and who never performed any actual service. This bill, therefore, excepts all of those. I believe there were two or three regiments that enlisted which never left their States or performed military service in the war and took no part in the war further than merely to enlist.

Mr. REED. What do you mean by those who actually entered into the war?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Those who actually participated in the war, or actually served with the Army and Navy in the war.

Mr. REED. Those who were in Mexico a single day?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is my understanding; if they were enlisted and actually performed service with the Army or Navy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman who introduced this bill to one clause which needs modification.

The SPEAKER. That may be done by consent after the debate. It could not be taken out of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, certainly it was not anticipated when the House made the Mexican war pension bill a special order that gentlemen would offer to pass it, and a new bill at that, under a suspension of the rules, so as to cut off almost all discussion on the merits of the measure, and certainly it results in denying to those who desire to perfect the bill all opportunities of suggesting proper and necessary amendments.

I confess that after having heard the bill read from the Clerk's desk I do not know that I clearly comprehend its provisions. But if I understood aright it proposes in the first place to give a pension to all of those men who appear on some muster-roll of the Army of the United States in its war with Mexico and who served for sixty days. It is simply necessary under the first clause that the applicant for a pension under this bill shall have figured on a muster-roll regardless of the place where or the circumstances under which he served; and I undertake to say that it will put men on the pension-rolls of this country who never saw a living or dead Mexican, who never heard the discharge of a gun during that war unless it was fired by accident. I am opposed, sir, to pensioning that class of fighters in the Mexican war or in any war.

This bill will put men on the pension-roll who never left the camp of rendezvous. It will put men on the pension-roll who never suffered the loss of limb or of health by wounds or by sickness. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, it puts all this sixty-day class—and I refer purely to the service clause—it puts men on the rolls regardless of health or age or pecuniary condition. It puts on the pension-roll millionaires, men who do not need the assistance of the Government of the United States. It puts Senators and Members of the House of Representatives on the pension-roll. It pensions men who are to-day giving it their support.

Mr. BELFORD. Do you know any millionaire who belongs to this House?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not desire to be interrupted, if the gentleman will pardon me.

I asserted in the last Congress, and I believe I was corrected by my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], that not a man, by any general act of Congress of the United States, who served in the Revolutionary war went on the pension-roll until thirty-seven years after its close.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman is entirely in error.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I say that no man went on the rolls as a service pensioner until thirty-seven years after the close of the Revolutionary war. The first act was passed on the 18th of March, 1818. The war closed in 1781, and under this act of the Congress of the United States it was necessary for the Revolutionary pensioner to show that he had served nine months at least, and to prove in a court of record that he was in such pecuniary circumstances as to need the assistance of the Government in his maintenance.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That was repealed in 1832.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And May 1, 1820, two years afterward, it was amended because it was alleged that persons had fraudulently gotten on the pension-roll, and pension claimants were required to take into the court a schedule of their property and swear to it, and further to declare that no other person held any property or fund in trust for them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That, as the gentleman must be aware, was repealed in 1832.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. You do not certainly want to misstate the facts. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I can not, Mr. Speaker, talk to all of these gentlemen in the fifteen minutes I am allowed, but if you will put the Mexican pension bill in such a shape that these statutes can be read in the hearing of this House I will show you the truth of what I am asserting. I challenge you to give me that opportunity.

The act of 1832 did not give a pension for only sixty days' service in the Revolution.

Now, what do I say in regard to these sixty-day men? Here is an amendment I propose to offer to the bill. I propose—and I speak for myself—to give every man who actually served in Mexico or participated in any battle in the Mexican war a pension, without regard to the time of his service. I propose, in the second place, to put on the pension-roll every man who was on the muster-roll of the Army of the United States for sixty days in that war who will show he was in such pecuniary condition as to need the assistance of the Government in his maintenance.

Ah, you say that is humiliating. It was not thought so by the fathers who provided for the soldiers of the Revolution. It is not thought so by this Congress, and never has been, because in every case in which a dependent mother or father is pensioned you require them to show that they are in such condition as to need the assistance of the Government in their maintenance and support. You require it to be done by the poor woman who brought her first-born and laid him broken and mangled on the altar of his country. You require it from the widow who is in weeds and stands in tears by the new-made grave of the husband. You require it of them. But, oh, it will not do to ask it of men who figured on a Mexican-war muster-roll for sixty days, and who never saw a battle or even witnessed the smoke of one from a distance.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman know of a man who served for sixty days in the Mexican war who was never at the seat of war?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes. I am glad the gentleman has asked me the question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There was not one such from Illinois.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My nearest neighbor, a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest regard, was in the Mexican war. He would be entitled to a pension under the provisions of this bill, and yet he never got nearer Mexico than the city of Saint Louis.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Was he a deserter?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, sir. He staid there at Saint Louis and bought supplies as quartermaster, sent them down the Mississippi River by way of New Orleans into Mexico, and under this bill you pension him.

I have another neighbor on the other side of me, an excellent gentleman, to whom I would give a pension. He went into Mexico, participated in the battles there, was captured with Cassius M. Clay, and was imprisoned by the Mexicans, and the gentleman from Illinois proposes to give the same amount of pension to the quartermaster and to the man who fought and was captured and imprisoned. Let me mention still another case. Another friend and neighbor fought through the Mexican war, went into the Army as a soldier in the late war of the rebellion, was wounded, and draws a greater pension than $8 a month. The gentleman from Illinois by his bill would not give this man a cent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You are mistaken. The bill gives him $8 a month.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then it has been changed. It was not so the other day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have introduced a new bill, and its provisions would give your friend a pension.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish the gentleman to make his speech in his own time. Your bill would in these instances be unequal and unjust.

Now, sir, I say to you that gentlemen on this side are willing to pass a fair Mexican-war pension bill.

Mr. MORRISON. Show us what your bill is. Bring it down.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have given you its outlines.

Mr. MORRISON. You never presented such a bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And I suppose you will try to amend it if I do, so as to secure a 20 per cent. horizontal reduction. [Laughter.]

You are in the majority. You control the committees. You make your reports; and when you bring your bills into this House under any fair system of legislation we on this side may propose such amendments as may seem necessary to make your measures conform to the public interests.

Proceeding a little further, I want to ask you gentlemen a question. How does it happen that you forget two millions of men who served in a war certainly equal in its proportions to the war between the United States and Mexico? How does it happen that you forget to include in this beneficent measure even the men who served in that war who served for a period of three years, or two years, or one year? You happened to think of the Creek war. You happened to think of the Black Hawk war.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Those are not embraced in this bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am talking about what you did on that side. And you happened to think of the Seminole war. You remember the wars that were prosecuted by States to recapture their runaway negroes. You remember the wars that were brought on by the States by violating the sacred obligation of treaty between the United States and savage tribes. You remember the wars that were provoked by State governors against national authority in the assertion of your States-right doctrines. You remember all who served in those wars and propose to put them on your pension-roll. Why do you forget these other men, the Union soldiers? You say it is thirty-seven years since the war with Mexico closed. It has been twenty years since the close of the war of the rebellion. And certainly the men who carried the flag of the nation to victory during three weary years of the war of the rebellion are as much entitled to a service pension as the men who mustered on the muster-roll of the Mexican war for sixty days.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Why did you not pension them in the last Congress?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Of the men who served in the Mexican war nearly 50,000—48,000 of them were from the slaveholding States. Why do you put them on this Mexican war pension bill and strike out the clause which denies pensions to those engaged in the rebellion? Why do you do it? Because of those 48,000 more than 20,000 of them afterward went into the rebellion and by this bill will be entitled to draw pensions out of the Treasury of the United States. It is because you can not get your rebel soldiery on any other pension-roll. That is the reason of it, and you know it and I know it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Why did not your friends bring in such a bill as——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am talking in my time and would like to keep it. I insist that when this bill is considered it shall come into the House so that we may have an opportunity of amending it, and by our amendments seek to do justice to the soldiers of the war for the Union.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is that so?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] had a fine opportunity during the last Congress by his action to vindicate his love for the Union soldiers. Though he was at the head of the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the last Congress, when his party was in the majority in both Houses of Congress, he brought in no bill to put the Union soldiers on the pension-rolls.

And the Union soldiers of this country are not so ignorant that they can be hoodwinked by the gentleman from Indiana in any such way. They know very well that the gentleman rings in the Union soldier here for but one purpose, and that is to defeat this bill, and not for the purpose of putting any Union soldiers on the pension-roll. If this bill is passed he will find that the Democrats both from the North and from the South will stand by the Union soldiers, as much so as the gentleman from Indiana or any other man on that side of the House.

The bill here proposed, so far as Mexican soldiers are concerned, is the bill which passed the House of the Forty-fourth Congress by a unanimous vote, and included the soldiers of the Indian wars which the gentleman from Indiana has talked about, and which he says were waged for the purpose of hunting up runaway negroes. Now, that was a very unkind cut by the gentleman from Indiana.

Does the gentleman know the cause of the Florida war? Does he know that before that war was declared against the Seminole Indians your government agent in Florida, Mr. Thompson, was massacred by the Indians? Does the gentleman forget that when your soldiers were marching from Tampa Bay to some other point in Florida, before the Florida war began, Major Dade's command of one hundred and twelve men were ambushed by over five hundred Indians and all massacred except three?

Mr. STEELE. This bill will not give them a pension.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Does the gentleman remember that that was the cause of the Florida war, and not any desire to hunt up runaway negroes? It was a war that originated in the cruelties and the massacres by the Seminole Indians of the white men in Florida and Alabama. It was not waged for any such purpose as the gentleman has declared here, and he must reread the history of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

One objection which I have to this bill, as it is presented here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], is that it leaves out the soldiers who fought in Florida. There never has been a war in this country, neither the late war nor the war with Mexico, where our soldiers suffered more than they suffered in the Florida war.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] objects to this bill because it does not embrace soldiers engaged in other wars than the war with Mexico. And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] likewise bases a complaint against it because it does not embrace the soldiers of other wars. I have desired to test the question whether the Mexican veterans have merit enough of their own to stand alone. I believe that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], or some one else, shall undertake to test the question whether the Union soldiers have merit enough to stand alone, it will be found that they have enough friends here to reward them with a pension.

I have desired to put this simple question before the House. After waiting thirty-six years from the time the Mexican war closed, and attaining an average age of 62 years, following in the line of the precedents established nearly a hundred years ago in reference to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war, and also the precedent established in reference to the soldiers of the war of 1812, the time has now come for us to reward the old veterans of the war with Mexico. If this is not done soon the last one of them will sink into his grave and have no use for your bounty or gratuity, for they are rapidly passing away.

Another thing; I want to call attention to the fact that the Legislature of the State of Indiana has shown itself more generous, more patriotic, more noble-hearted than its Representative on this floor to-day. The State of Indiana, through her Legislature, as well as my own State of Illinois and twenty-five other States of the Union, have remembered their debt of gratitude to the brave soldiers of the Mexican war, and have instructed their representatives in Congress to vote in favor of giving a pension to these old veterans. I stand here to-day ready to obey the command of the Legislature of Illinois, but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has signalized his determination to disbey the instructions of the Legislature of his own State and the voice of the patriotic people of Indiana.

Another word in reply to the gentleman. In the last Congress his party had control of both branches as well as of the executive department of the Government. He and his party then had it in their power to give a pension to every Union soldier. Why did not the gentleman from Indiana demonstrate his love for the Union soldiers when he was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the last Congress, and bring in a bill of that character?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not take my time, sir. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman by indirection is seeking to "knife" this bill; he is seeking to defeat it by means which are not fair and square.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I want to say simply this: that the committee of which I was chairman in the last Congress did not have jurisdiction of any subject of this kind.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman's committee had jurisdiction of pensions for Union soldiers and none but Union soldiers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

Mr. CALKINS. By the kindness of the gentleman from Illinois, I wish merely to say that during the contest in this House a week or two ago upon fixing a time for the consideration of a bill of this character I declared myself in favor of pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war by any bill which should be purely and simply a Mexican-soldier pension bill. I still believe the time has come when this country ought to pension these soldiers. Taking twenty-five years as their average age when they entered into that service, the survivors are now 62 years old. The pension now proposed is but a small amount for a generous country to give to these men (whose hair is now frosted and who will soon pass away) for the immense territory which that war gave to this Government. As a graceful tribute to their services I think this bill should pass. I will only add that I regret exceedingly the bill could not have been brought before us in such a way as to be subject to amendment and fuller discussion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER].

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the day when justice is about to be done to the men, now gray-haired, who in the prime of their years followed the starry flag to a foreign land and by their bravery succeeded in adding to this Republic territory greater in area than the thirteen original States—a territory which opened up to us a magnificent stretch of seacoast, and, for its extent, of greater riches than any other upon which the sun shines. We have already taken a thousand millions of dollars of gold and silver from it, and there is enough left to pay pensions for all our wars for a thousand years. These Mexican veterans have been shamefully treated. Their grand achievements have never been properly rewarded. I am not afraid of liberal pensions. No country was ever bankrupted by paying pensions to those who imperiled their lives in their country's service.

I am surprised to see the opposition which my colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] makes to this proposition. I am surprised to see him undertaking to defeat this measure by means which I think unfair. It is but a small matter, involving a few millions of dollars—not more perhaps than two or three millions—to pension these veterans, who are now in need and tottering on the brink of the grave.

I am opposed to the proposition of my colleague [Mr. BROWNE] which would require these gallant men to show that they were paupers before they should be entitled to pension. I say to him it would be humiliating, and for one I say spare them such humiliation.

I hope this measure will receive a two-thirds vote of the House, and that in the other branch of Congress it may be promptly concurred in, so that this long-deferred act of justice may become a law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that this debate be extended thirty minutes longer. This is a bill fraught with very grave consequences, I think—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, in one minute I can not tell the House of the magnificence of the domain which was won for our country by our soldiery in the Mexican war, an area equal to the thirteen original States. California, the land of wheat even more than of gold and silver, and Texas, the land of corn and cattle, were won for the Government by these soldiers to whom we now seek to do this simple act of justice. It is time, full time, that it had been done. The gold in the corn and the silver in the wheat, not to speak of the vast wealth in the sunless caverns of the earth won by these men, ought to bring every man to his feet to honor these veterans of the Mexican war.

But, sir, I rose only to say in behalf of the gentlemen on this side of the House that the language of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] should not be applied to Democrats here. He intimated that gentlemen on this side, because they can not get rebel soldiers on the pension-rolls by reason of their having been engaged in the rebellion, are now seeking to do indirectly what we dare not do directly, and to pension soldiers of the Mexican war because they were rebels. If that was the gentleman's idea, I for one repudiate it. It is unknown to this side of the House. Language has no term of reproach and the mind no sentiment of detestation adequate to the expression of the odiousness of that idea which is attempted to be fixed on this side of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this motion be continued for thirty minutes. [Cries of "No!" No!"]

Mr. HAMMOND. I object. Let us vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent that general leave be given to print remarks on this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent to have an amendment made to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent of the House to be permitted to move an amendment striking out one section and inserting another.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Unless we can have further discussion, let us have no amendment.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 227, nays 46, not voting 47; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. CONNOLLY said: My colleague Mr. STORM is absent attending a funeral. If here, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. DEUSTER. I am paired with my colleague Mr. PRICE. If he were here, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the pairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HANCOCK with Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, with Mr. PATTON.

Mr. DUNHAM with Mr. MULLER.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. O'HARA.

Mr. FINDLAY with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. ROWELL with Mr. RIGGS.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KING. I ask by unanimous consent there be general leave to print.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Before that is put, I ask unanimous consent to add some things to my remarks.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let it be open to all who wish to print on this subject.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

Mr. SPEAKER. If there be no objection leave will be grantod to the gentleman from Indiana to add to his remarks.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand there is objection to printing additional remarks by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It must be general.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I just want to say that the objection will certainly be reciprocated. You bring a bill in here and refuse to let it be discussed or amended.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BEACH. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, four members only voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York and these Eastern gentlemen generally if they do think it is about time to give us Western people a chance? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 77.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let us have tellers.

Tellers were ordered, forty-four members voting in favor thereof—being more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. MCCOID were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 95.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of New York. If in order I am willing to withdraw the motion to adjourn, if it be not too late.

The SPEAKER. The House has voted on the motion. The Chair thinks it is too late, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. Evidently the House refused to order the yeas and nays under a misapprehension. We did not abandon the call for the yeas and nays, for it was supposed naturally that a vote by tellers or a division would have settled the question. The purpose of refusing the yeas and nays at the beginning was because we conceived that the vote might be determined in a readier manner. But now have we not the right to insist upon the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not of course take notice of the purpose for which the yeas and nays were refused, but simply of the fact that they were refused.

Mr. BAYNE. I now call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused by the House already. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] now moves to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. RYAN, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. MILLER, and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCOID. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCOID. I wish to inquire whether by unanimous consent this motion to adjourn and the proceedings thereon can not be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MCCOID. I suggest to the gentleman from New York to ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is not in my power. Objection has been made all around me.

Mr. WILLIS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the yeas and nays; on that the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 126, not voting 48; as follows:

SEAL OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Senate; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Rules:

UNITED STATES SENATE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 4, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a letter from the assistant librarian of the Senate in reference to the seal of the Senate.

Heretofore I have declined to attach the seal to any document, because I have not been able to find authority for doing so; and I submit to you the propriety of the Senate taking some action, by resolution or otherwise, clearly defining the authority of the Secretary in the premises.

Yours, respectfully,

ANSON G. MCCOOK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PALMER. I present resolutions of the Board of Trade of Detroit, Mich., indorsing the protest of the Merchants' Exchange of Buffalo, N. Y., against the extension of the various patents for improvements in what is known as the steam grain-shovel. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present resolutions addressed to the Senate, adopted by the S. R. Deach Post, No. 58, Grand Army of the Republic, of Jewell City, State of Kansas, in which it—

Enters its earnest and emphatic protest against the reinstatement of Fitz-John Porter by the Senate of the United States, as such an act would be regarded as an insult to the loyal soldiers who zealously obeyed all orders with alacrity for the maintenance of this Government, and would not comport with the avowed principles of our Government toward those who are known to be traitors.

By order of the post (numbering 95).

J. H. SWEANY,
Post Commander.
E. D. HEINECKE,
Adjutant.

I believe that these resolutions voice the opinion of nine-tenths of the surviving soldiers of the war of the rebellion, and in their expression I cordially concur. As the bill has been reported, I move that the resolution lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Theodore Casterline, a citizen of Axtell, Kans., late private Company G, First Regiment United States Cavalry Volunteers, praying for the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of 2,000 citizens of the city of New York and a petition of over 200 citizens residing in various parts of the State of New York, praying for the repeal of the act and acts supplementary thereto by which the term of many administrative offices was changed and fixed at four years; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. JONAS presented the petition of Edwin E. Saunders and J. A. Decuir, of Franklin, La., praying to be allowed to bring suit in the Court of Claims, and for the passage of a bill for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I present a petition from W. D. Chipley, W. A. D'Alemberté, William H. Knowles, and W. J. Vankirk, a committee of the Board of Trade of Pensacola, Fla., praying Congress to make an adequate appropriation for the improvement of the outer and inner bars of the harbor of Pensacola, Fla., and for deepening the channel to a depth of thirty feet and to an adequate width for all purposes of commerce.

In presenting this petition in the momentary absence of my colleague, whose proper and zealous efforts in behalf of Pensacola are well known, I desire to say that these gentlemen are persons of intelligence and high character, and largely engaged in trade and commerce. The merchants of Pensacola, whom they represent, are equal to any body of men in enterprise and public spirit and intelligence. They do not appreciate more highly than it deserves the magnificent harbor of Pensacola, and its valuê to the interstate and foreign commerce of the United States and its incomparable advantages as a safe naval station for the Gulf. Pensacola already attracts a large foreign commerce, and the most important national considerations demand that the prayer of their petition shall be granted, and that a survey and estimate shall be immediately made so that an adequate appropriation may be made at this session of Congress.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of John M. Stowell, Alexander Mitchell, and 744 other citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the repeal of laws limiting the term of certain administrative offices to four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. FRYE. I have a memorial of the La Fayette Grover Post, No. 45, Grand Army of the Republic, of Vinal Haven, Me., addressed to the delegation from Maine in Congress assembled, but undoubtedly intended for Congress itself. It relates to the equalization of bounties. I ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be received as a memorial and so referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition of the board of regents of the State University of California, praying for legislation in relation to the agricultural-college grant of lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SABIN presented a memorial of the common council of Duluth, Minn., favoring an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 7) to permit the erection of a statue of Garibaldi on the grounds of the national cemetery at Vicksburg, submitted an adverse report thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 689) granting a pension to Eliza Barbour, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 828) granting a pension to Thomas Patton, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 153) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish tents for the fifth annual reunion of the soldiers and sailors of the Northwest, to be held at Chicago in the month of August, 1884, have duly considered the same and instructed me to report it to the Senate adversely, recommending that it be indefinitely postponed, as there are no tents to be supplied for such purpose, and it would be an enormous expense to the Government to undertake to procure them.

The joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1219) to donate condemned cast-iron cannon to the citizens of Waterville, Me., have duly considered the same and instructed me to report it back to the Senate adversely, recommending that the bill be indefinitely postponed. Under appropriations heretofore made there are one hundred and four condemned cannon yet to be delivered, and of those on hand there are only sixty-seven field-pieces ranging from two thousand to seventeen hundred pounds, and all the others are heavy pieces weighing from twenty-five hundred to fifteen thousand pounds; so that it is useless to attempt to pass any bill of this character.

Mr. FRYE. Allow me to inquire of the Senator whether the committee makes adverse reports in all similar cases?

Mr. COCKRELL. We report adversely upon every one of them. I submit a full report, giving all the facts and the reports from the Secretary of War on the subject.

Mr. FRYE. I inquire further whether at the last session of Congress quite a large number of adverse reports were not made for the same reason?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is stated in the report which I submit. The report reviews the whole history of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1522) granting condemned cannon to R. H. Graham Post of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Moline, Ill., have instructed me to report it adversely, with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed on the ground stated in the report.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following joint resolution and bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and they were indefinitely postponed:

Joint resolution (S. R. 60) donating condemned cannon to the town of Cavendish, Vt.;

A bill (S. 1528) donating four condemned mortars, four cannon and carriages, and one hundred shell and shot to the town of Rutland, Vt.; and

A bill (S. 1527) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to the governor of the State of Kansas four pieces of condemned cannon for the use of the Leavenworth Light Infantry Battalion.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1517) granting eight condemned cannon to be used in the erection of a statue to the memory of General William H. Lytle, of Ohio, have instructed me to report it adversely. The bill proposes to donate eight condemned bronze cannon, and not cast-iron. In the report I have stated the action of the committee heretofore, and that all and more than all the condemned bronze cannon on hand have already been appropriated by acts of Congress. The committee therefore recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 927) granting a pension to James Rockwell; and

A bill (S. 930) granting a pension to Spencer W. Tryon.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 545) for the relief of the widow of Col. Lyman M. Kellogg, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1218) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Baker, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Electa W. Jacobs, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 429) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 615) granting arrears of pension to Wellington V. Huested; and

A bill (S. 485) granting a pension to L. V. Hallyfield.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1000) for the relief of George F. Roberts, administrator of the estate of William B. Thayer, deceased, surviving partner of Thayer Brothers, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 336) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I report back, by direction of the Committee on Finance, the bill (S. 1285) for the relief of J. L. Whitaker and the bill (S. 1470) for the relief of J. L. Whitaker with a bill in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be indefinitely postponed, and the proposed substitute will be read by its title.

The bill (S. 1705) to provide for the issue of duplicate checks was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely state that the only change in the existing law is to provide that checks when lost or stolen may be paid by the Treasury Department if they exceed the amount of $1,000 and do not exceed the amount of $2,500. It merely strikes out "$1,000" in section 3646 of the Revised Statutes and inserts "$2,500." I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it go over until the regular Calendar is called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. I rose to ask the Senator from Alabama if he would not allow the bill to be called up after the regular morning business is concluded.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection at all to its consideration after the call of morning business.

Mr. BECK. There are so many little things of this character annoying us all the time that it is better to pass a general bill. We can dispose of the bill in a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid on the table until after the call of morning business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States on the subject, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1706) to accept and ratify an agreement with the confederated tribes of the Flathead, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreille Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1110) for the relief of James H. Hamilton, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 516) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1106) for the relief of Frances H. Plummer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 733) dedicating the military reservation at Plattsburg, N. Y., to the village of Plattsburg, for a public park, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1347) for the relief of the sufferers by loss of the Government steamer J. Don Cameron, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1670) to relieve the members and judge-advocate of the general court-martial for the trial of Fitz-John Porter from the operation of certain restrictions of the eighty-fourth article of war, to report it without amendment. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama objects, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1519) to regulate the powers and duties of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument, to report it without amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

In connection with the bill I offer the following order for the printing of additional copies of the report for the use of the Senate, which will go to the Committee on Printing under the rules:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the report on Senate bill 1399, entitled "A bill to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument," be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Report of the National Academy of Sciences, with its appendices, be printed in the usual octavo form, but that the four accompanying memoirs be printed in quarto form; and that 1,000 additional copies of the report and memoirs be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Academy of Sciences.

I beg the Senate to allow the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Academy of Sciences, as Senators know, is constituted by an act of Congress, and its members are required without compensation to report upon such subjects of importance, scientific and other, as may be committed to them by the various Departments. Among the reports referred to in this resolution are two of great public value, one concerning glucose, to which some of the most eminent chemists have given attention, and the other concerning methylated alcohol, which has in view, I suppose, some possible changes in taxation upon alcohol for mechanical and manufacturing purposes. The academy is required to make an annual report.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1707) to establish a court of appeals and to provide additional circuit court judges; which was read twice by its title.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1708) to amend the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," and to repeal sections 639 and 640 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire in this connection to say that I present these bills at the request of the Law Association of Philadelphia, who have been considering the general question for many years, and who have considered it very carefully, as I think, and have embodied their views in a report which I shall call to the attention of the Judiciary Committee. Therefore the bills represent more than my individual ideas on the subject. I move that the bills be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Ordered, That the paper in the case of Mrs. Mary Griffith be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, it was Ordered, That the papers now on file in the Senate relating to the claim of Virginia and other States for advances made to the United States during the war of 1812-'14 be withdrawn and delivered to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the papers now on file in the Senate relating to the case of John S. Braxton, late collector of customs at Norfolk, be withdrawn and delivered to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John T. Henneman be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to the Senate the amount of judgments or awards, and in whose favor rendered, against the Government by the courts or by duly appointed commissioners, and from which no appeal has been taken and the time for an appeal has expired, and where the liability of the Government is admitted, and if he knows of any reason why judgments of that class should not be paid for damages occasioned by the erection of dams on the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement in the State of Wisconsin.

DUPLICATES OF LOST CHECKS.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will now call up the bill which he reported this morning from the Committee on Finance. It will save some trouble if we pass it now.

Mr. MORRILL. Would it be in order to ask for the consideration of the bill at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the bill be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1705) to provide for the issue of duplicate checks.

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"Whenever any original check is lost, stolen, or destroyed, disbursing officers and agents of the United States are authorized, after the expiration of six months, and within three years from the date of such check, to issue a duplicate check; and the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, and designated depositaries of the United States are directed to pay such duplicate checks, upon notice and proof of the loss of the original checks, under such regulations in regard to their issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bonds, with sureties, to indemnify the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. This section shall not apply to any check exceeding in amount the sum of $2,500."

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely say that the bill only changes the words "$1,000" to "$2,500." If passed it will save some labor in both Houses in the consideration of various private bills from year to year. My recollection is that at one time we passed a bill where the amount exceeded $1,000 by only $1; and in all cases that we have acted upon for the last four or five years the excess above $1,000 has been very small. It was thought best by the Committee on Finance to report a general bill, to save the introduction of special bills for special cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. For the reason stated by the Senator from Vermont, and because the bill will take from Congress a large number of special bills for relief which are absolutely necessary under the existing law, I am in favor of the present consideration and passage of this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. DOLPH. Some time since I introduced a bill, which is No. 11 in the order of business, being the bill (S. 701) making appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington. If it shall be the pleasure of the Senate, I should like to call up the bill at 2 o'clock on Friday next for the purpose of submitting some remarks and having the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 50) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment reported by the Committee on Railroads, which was to strike all out after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute, but before concluding was interrupted by

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to make objection to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. I have no objection personally to fixing a day for its consideration, but there are some amendments that I wish to suggest, and I do not think we can safely consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana objects to the further consideration of the bill. Under the objection it goes over.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator and the Senate be willing to fix any day, not a distant day, when we may consider the case?

Mr. HARRISON. With reference to special orders, so far as I am concerned there are two or three bills that we very nearly approached two weeks ago on the General Calendar for 2 o'clock, and I do not feel like consenting to special orders until we have passed some of those bills; but within a few days I shall be willing to agree with the Senator from Georgia in fixing an early day for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BROWN. I shall probably make the motion then at an early day to fix a day for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. As soon as we pass a bill or two that is on the regular Calendar I shall make no objection.

DETAILS FROM THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 641) concerning details from the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "consecutively," to insert "except by order of the President;" so as to read:

That no regimental or company officer shall be detached from duty with his regiment or company for more than three years consecutively, except by an order of the President; and any officer heretofore or hereafter detailed who shall be returned to duty with his company or regiment under the provisions of this act shall not be again detailed, except temporarily, and not then for a period of more than sixty days, until after the expiration of three years from his return to his company or regiment.

Mr. CONGER. I think the bill should go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects to the further consideration of the bill, and it will go over.

DESTRUCTION OF SALT-WORKS.

The bill (S. 13) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Ky., pursuant to the orders of Maj. Gen. Carlos Buell, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over. There is an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee objects to the consideration of the bill, and it will go over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to Order of Business No. 119, being Senate bill 551, which was under consideration under Rule VIII some days since and was objected to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER]. I understand that that Senator is now willing to withdraw his objection, and I make the point that the bill is now entitled to be considered under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks the present consideration of the bill he has indicated. Is there objection? If not, it will be considered before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be reported by title for information.

The Secretary read the title of the bill (S. 551) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. This can only come up for consideration by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Kansas had better not interrupt the proceeding under Rule VIII by asking to bring up this bill, as it stands in a very different attitude.

Mr. PLUMB. It properly stands for consideration under Rule VIII.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Chair to rule against that proposition.

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The five-minute rule will apply to it under Rule VIII.

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly. I understand the effect of the withdrawal of the objection is simply to place the bill where it was before the objection was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I should think where an objection is once interposed and a case is passed over that it comes under the operation of Rule IX. The objector can not by withdrawing the objection restore a bill to the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next order.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Chair hold that this bill is not restored to its place under the eighth rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds.

THE BARK VISCOUNT CANNING.

The bill (S. 452) to remit the forfeiture of the British bark Viscount Canning, and to refund the proceeds of the sale thereof to her owners, Edward D. Morris and C. R. Morris, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the matter of the forfeiture of the British bark Viscount Canning, on which she was condemned and sold by order of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, at Mobile, in June, 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to proceed on the petition for remission in the same manner and with the same effect as if the sum arising from the sale of said vessel had not been covered into the Treasury; and if said forfeiture, or any part thereof, shall be remitted, the Secretary of the Treasury may pay out of the Treasury such sum as he may remit to the parties entitled thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. VEST. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no written report accompanying the bill. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] reported it.

Mr. VEST. I should like to know something about it.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill was reported by the committee at the last session of Congress and passed the Senate, and also reported in the present form at this session, changing slightly the form of the preceding bill under the letter of advice of the Secretary of the Treasury. A sum of money remains in the Treasury which can not be returned to the owners of the bark Viscount Canning because the application had not been made within the period of time required by the statute. Owing to a delay in court the application was not made in time. The Secretary of the Treasury is only authorized to examine the case as if the application had been made in time. There is no dispute about the claim. The Secretary of the Treasury sent a letter to the Senate informing the Senate of the disposition of the claim, but its consideration by the Secretary of the Treasury was prevented by lapse of time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

The bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 13, after the word "by" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "any justice of the peace upon complaint made to him" and insert "the police court of the District of Columbia;" in line 16, before the word "police," to insert "said;" after "District of Columbia," in line 22, to insert "with the consent of the constituted authorities of such asylum or institution;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, by the police force of said District, aid the said society, its officers and agents, in the enforcement of all laws relating to or affecting the protection of children; and the commissioners of the said District and their successors are authorized, in their discretion, to detail, from time to time, an officer or officers to aid specially in the work of said society, or they may commission any duly appointed agents of said society special police officers, without compensation; and such agents or officers shall have power to arrest, without warrant, all persons violating within their view any law relating to or affecting the protection of children, or other parties so offending by virtue of a warrant issued by the police court of the District of Columbia, which offenders shall be taken by such agents or officers before the said police court of the District of Columbia for trial. Said agents or officers are also hereby empowered to bring before the said court any child who is subjected to cruel treatment, willful abuse, or neglect, or any child under 16 years of age found in a house of ill-fame; and said court may commit such child to an orphan asylum or other public charitable institution in the District of Columbia, with the consent of the constituted authorities of such asylum or institution, or make such other disposition thereof as now is or may hereafter be provided by law in cases of vagrant, destitute, or abandoned children: Provided, That any parent, guardian, or near relative who may feel aggrieved by any order of said court in the premises may appeal therefrom to the criminal court of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 12, before the word "character," to insert "dangerous," and after the word "pauper," in the same line, to strike out "or peddler;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That any person in the District of Columbia who shall torture, cruelly beat, abuse, or otherwise willfully maltreat any child under the age of 18 years; or any person, having the custody and possession of a child under the age of 14 years, who shall expose, or aid and abet in exposing, such child in any highway, street, field, house, outhouse, or other place, with intent to abandon it; or any person, having in his custody or control a child under the age of 14 years, who shall in any way dispose of it with a view to its being employed as an acrobat, or a gymnast, or a contortionist, or a circus-rider, or a rope-walker, or in any exhibition of like dangerous character, or as a beggar, or mendicant, or pauper, or street-singer, or street-musician; or any person who shall take, receive, hire, employ, use, exhibit, or have in custody any child of the age last named for any of the purposes last enumerated, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and when convicted thereof shall be subject to punishment by a fine of not more than $250, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 2, after the words "age of," to strike out "18" and insert "21;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That any person who shall entice, decoy, place, take, or receive any female child under the age of 21 years into any house of ill-fame or disorderly house, for the purpose of prostitution, or any person who, having in his custody or control such child, shall dispose of it to be so received, or to be received in or for any obscene, indecent, or immoral purpose, exhibition, or practice, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and when convicted thereof shall be subject to punishment by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senate that the Chief Clerk calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] some days ago gave notice that he intended to offer an amendment which is now in the hands of the Chief Clerk.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That amendment was handed to me by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and at his request laid before the Committee on the District of Columbia for their consideration. I believe they unanimously concluded not to adopt the amendment. I so reported to the Senator from Vermont, and I presume that he accepted the judgment of the committee. I have heard nothing from him since about it.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to offer the amendment in the form I now send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware may modify his amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware as modified will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to insert:

That whenever any female vagrant or incorrigible corrupt girl or woman of known evil repute and life is found soliciting vice upon the streets or elsewhere, or residing in a house of ill-fame, she may be sent under arrest to the Home of the Good Shepherd, or to the Home of the Association for Works of Mercy, and required to labor at some suitable employment, and receive instruction and practical training; and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the support of such class of females in the said institutions, one-half of said sum being applicable to each of the said institutions.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I judge there will be no objection to ingrafting this provision upon this bill. It is the result of a very careful and benevolent examination of a class of people in this District who especially need the care of Congress. It has been said by a proverb that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. No stronger illustration could be found than that suggested by this amendment. It is to rescue the young, the ignorant, the helpless, the unprotected class of females who are hovering on the brink of vice and have not quite stepped over it. It is to rescue them by committing them to the charge of thoughtful and organized benevolence in order that they may be taught the means of a practical, industrious, and honest means of self-support. There are two of these establishments, one thoroughly organized and in existence upon the basis of private benevolence, which, however, is not able to extend its operation so wide as is desirable; the other which under law has just been organized, and therefore needs at once the helping hand of Congress. It is not a mere charity; it is an assistance to provide active, well-organized benevolence.

I know not how a person who has made charity to a class a study can be more obliged than when he shall assist at the personal efforts and the labor that accompanies or ought to accompany personal charity in behalf of a dangerous class in the community. The effort now is, and I have been made the instrument of that, by two benevolent associations of this District, by offering this amendment, at a small cost to do an infinite amount of good in the way of anticipating evil results.

I trust this measure may receive the approval of the Senate. I do not understand that it is opposed by the committee, but simply that the responsibility of providing an appropriation to make the amendment efficient may not be for one reason or another ascribed to the committee. I mentioned it, however, to the chairman of the committee—the Senator having the bill in charge at that time was not in the Senate Chamber—and from him I derived the impression that there would be really no objection to it. I am sure after considering this subject and examining the object, the scope, the effect of the amendment, it will commend itself to the approval of every member of this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee is not here just at this moment, but I can briefly state the objections to this amendment.

In the first place, I think it is the opinion of those who examined it that it would be impracticable; and in the next place, a very much graver objection, it is thought it is unconstitutional. It takes a certain class of offenders against the morality of the District of Columbia without warrant or other process, and practically imprisons them without trial. That is the gravest objection to the amendment. I believe that is the only real objection I have to urge against it, because that was esteemed to be all that it would be necessary to say.

I believe further that the bill would be embarrassed very much by putting such an amendment on, if its efficacy would not be entirely destroyed.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I really think that the Senator prehends——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the fact that under Rule VIII no Senator has a right to address the Senate more than once and only for five minutes.

Mr. BAYARD. Has he a right to speak twice, so that he does not exceed five minutes on the two occasions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that he can not break his five minutes into two speeches.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no disposition to violate the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to have the Senator from Delaware give us some more definite information concerning the character of these institutions. Are they purely private, or are they church institutions of any descriptions, denominational strictly?

Mr. BAYARD. If I may answer the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the time of the Senator from Connecticut the Senator from Delaware may answer his question, with his permission.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment is nothing but in the line of the exercise of the ordinary police powers now vested in these magistrates. It simply gives them these places which are to-day supported by private means to commit these parties to; it gives the institutions public assistance, and thereby subjects them to public supervision.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will state my object in making the inquiry. I do not know these institutions; I am not aware of their particular character. But by such a course as is here proposed it is possible that we may form such a connection with a private institution that it will lead us to make continual appropriations, and that may hereafter be considered a duty. If there are reformatory institutions needed in the District in any direction, let us establish them ourselves, support them, and send these vicious people to them. Any reformatory or corrective institutions that are needed here we ought to provide. I am a little jealous of involving ourselves in these different denominational affairs. We shall create prejudices among the people here and involve ourselves in annual appropriations possibly not necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The question being put, it was declared that the "noes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware enlarges the scope of this bill considerably and presents some very interesting questions, as indeed the original bill does, and I do not think justice can be done to the subject under the limitation of a five-minute debate. Never objecting to considering anything that anybody asks for, I must object to this bill being considered under the limitation of debate. I think it is better it should go over without prejudice, and we can take it up some time when we can look into the whole subject. The written report that accompanies the original bill has not been read, and, without any intention to delay the matter, I object to the consideration of the bill for that simple reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Shall the Chair understand the Senator to object or to ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to its being passed over without prejudice to its position on the Calendar, leaving it at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I inquire, what position would that place the bill in? Would it come up to-morrow again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it be passed over by unanimous consent without prejudice, leaving it at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII, it will be the first bill on the Calendar to-morrow morning.

Mr. PLATT. We shall be no better off to-morrow morning than we are now. Why can we not suspend the rule now? Or if it goes over under objection, I understand that a motion to take it up adopted by the Senate will take it out of the five-minute rule. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the fact that as I understand the rule if objection is made he can move to take up the bill, and if he can obtain the vote of the Senate to take it up, then it takes it out of the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know what is the practice of the Senate in that regard. If a single objection carries the bill over, how can it be possible that a mere motion by a majority vote will bring it up now for further consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, is there objection to passing over this bill informally, leaving it at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears no objection, and it is passed over. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

COUNTERFEITING OF FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The bill (S. 1369) to punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE YELLOWSTONE PARK.

The bill (S. 221) to amend sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the boundaries of the Yellowstone National Park, as now fixed by section numbered 2474 of the Revised Statutes, shall hereafter be as follows: Beginning at a point on the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude where said parallel is intersected by the meridian of 111° west longitude; thence due east to a point on said meridian within ten miles of the eastern boundary of the park as now established; thence due south five miles; thence due east to the meridian of 109° 30′ west longitude; thence due south along said meridian to the forty-fourth parallel of north latitude; thence due west along said parallel to its point of intersection with the meridian of 111° west longitude; thence due north along said meridian to the place of beginning; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause an accurate survey to be made of the boundary lines of said park as established by this act, said survey to be recorded in the offices of the surveyor-general and Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, as provided by law.

SEC. 2. That all of the territory embraced within the limits of the park as herein established shall be reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasure-ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States; and said territory so set apart shall be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to all the provisions of sections numbered 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, and for the protection of the game animals found in the park, to prevent their capture or destruction. He shall cause all persons trespassing upon the park to be removed therefrom, and shall take all measures which he may think necessary to carry out the purposes of this act; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to make such details of troops as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, may require for the purpose of preventing trespassers or intruders from entering the park with the object of destroying the game therein, or other illegal purposes, and for removing such persons from the park.

SEC. 4. That the killing, wounding, or capturing, at any time, of any buffalo, bison, moose, elk, deer, mountain sheep, Rocky Mountain goat, antelope, beaver, otter, martin, fisher, grouse, prairie-chicken, pheasant, fool-hen, partridge, quail, wild goose, duck, eagle, magpie, swan, heron, sparrow, robin, meadow-lark, thrush, goldfinch, flicker or yellow-hammer, blackbird, oriole, jay, snow-bird, or any of the small birds commonly known as singing-birds, is prohibited within the limits of said park; nor shall any fish be taken out of the waters of the park by means of seines, nets, traps, or by the use of drugs or any explosive substances or compounds, or in any other way than by hook and line. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined for each offense not less than twenty nor more than one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Possession of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any of the animals or birds hereinbefore mentioned shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, or stage, express, or railroad company, receiving for transportation any of the animals, birds, or fish named herein, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that such animals, birds, or fish were killed or captured in violation of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $250, to be recovered by a proceeding in the nature of an information before any Territorial or United States district court within whose jurisdiction such offense was committed; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for such Territory or district to institute and prosecute said proceeding in the name of the United States, the amount collected from the party offending to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may lease small portions of ground in the park, not exceeding ten acres in extent for each tract, on which may be erected hotels and the necessary outbuildings, and for a period not exceeding ten years; but such lease shall not include any of the geysers or other objects of curiosity or interest in said park, or exclude the public from the free and convenient approach thereto, or include any ground within one-quarter of a mile of any of the geysers or the Yellowstone Falls; nor shall there be leased more than one tract of not exceeding ten acres to any one person, association, or corporation; nor shall any hotel or other buildings be erected within the park until such lease shall be executed by the Secretary of the Interior; and all contracts, agreements, or exclusive privileges heretofore made or given in regard to said park, or any part thereof, inconsistent with this act, are hereby declared to be invalid; nor shall the Secretary of the Interior, in any lease which he may make and execute, grant any exclusive privileges within said park, except upon the ground leased.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of giving protection to life and property within said park the laws of the Territory of Montana are hereby extended over the same, so far as said laws do not conflict with this act; and said park is declared to be, for the purpose aforesaid, and the administration of justice generally therein, a part of the county of Gallatin, in said Territory, until Congress shall otherwise provide. But all costs and expenses arising in cases under this act, and properly chargeable to the United States, shall be certified by the court or justice trying said cases to the United States marshal for Montana, and shall be paid by him out of any public funds in his hands, and be reported by him to the Department of Justice, as in the case of other costs in the United States courts. The violation of any regulation made and published by the Secretary the Interior in regard to the control and management of the park, and the protection of the game and public property therein, is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, and the party convicted shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than twenty nor more than one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not exceeding three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint a superintendent of the park, who shall be paid an annual salary of $2,000, and fifteen assistants, who shall each be paid annually $900. And it shall be the duty of said superintendent and his assistants to reside continuously in the park, and to protect the game and public property, to preserve the peace, and prevent crime; and for this purpose they shall have power to arrest all persons committing any crime or misdemeanor within the park, and shall also have all the powers and duties conferred by law upon the sheriffs and constables for the Territory of Montana and their deputies: Provided, That the power hereby conferred shall be exercised only within the limits of said park, and in conveying persons arrested to the nearest court or officer having jurisdiction of the crime or misdemeanor with which the person or persons have been charged: And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing the United States marshals from serving within the territory of the park any writ or process issued by lawful authority: And provided also, That no timber in said park shall be cut, either for building purposes or for firewood, except by the permission in writing of the superintendent of said park, specifying the place at which said timber may be cut and the quantity thereof.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War shall detail an officer from the Corps of Engineers, whose duty it shall be to survey and lay out suitable roads in said park and select the proper location for bridges therein; and the Secretary of War shall, upon the report of said officer, make annual estimates for the cost of such improvements, and communicate the same to Congress, with such other recommendations in regard to the park as he may deem proper; and all sums received by the Secretary of the Interior from rents in the park, or arising from fines or forfeitures for violations of the laws and regulations made for the government of said park and protection of the game and public property therein, shall be applied to the improvements hereinbefore mentioned; and the officer or officers collecting said fines and forfeitures shall pay the same to the superintendent of the park, to be accounted for by him to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 9. That all leases, contracts, rules, and regulations made or issued by the Secretary of the Interior as herein provided for shall be subject to the approval of the President.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there any report with this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no printed report. What has been read is the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories in the nature of a substitute for the original bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear in what particular the boundaries as defined in section 1 of the amendment differ from those under existing law, whether the area of the park is increased or diminished.

Mr. VEST. It is a little difficult without a map to explain exactly the change. As the park is now constituted, there are about two miles taken on the north from the Territory of Montana and upon the western side about two miles are taken out of the Territory of Idaho. The rest of the park is taken from the Territory of Wyoming.

The change of boundaries, as we propose it, is to diminish the boundary on the north two miles and on the west two miles, bringing the northern boundary down to a parallel of latitude and the western boundary to a meridian of longitude, so as to bring the boundaries to the original lines between Wyoming and Montana on the north and Idaho and Wyoming on the west. On the south the park is extended by this change of boundary between nine and ten miles. On the east the park is extended about thirty miles, so as to take in a large extent of country which is the home of large game and covered with forest trees, the preservation of which is absolutely necessary to protect the sources of large rivers, and without including that it is absolutely impossible to protect either the timber or the large game which there exist.

The change is made in accordance with the opinion of the officers in charge of the geographical survey of the United States and of General Sheridan, and after I had personal conversations myself with guides, hunters, and trappers who are familiar with that country. It takes in no country which is valuable for mineral purposes or for grazing purposes. In the northeastern corner of the boundaries as defined by the first section there is a portion of the park excepted on account of the Clark's Fork mines. The line runs east with a parallel of latitude within five miles of the eastern boundary of the park as now defined; then the line goes south ten miles, and then directly east. This change, as I said before, is made on account of the mines at that point. The Delegate from the Territory and the gentlemen interested in those mines thought that this exception would cover all the mineral discoveries that would probably be made. This is done to avoid any complication as to title, and in order to give those now engaged in that enterprise full scope and opportunity to proceed with their business.

Mr. INGALLS. The area withdrawn from the public domain, then, if I correctly understand the Senator from Missouri, has been largely increased by the amendment of the committee?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator inform us what the number of square miles aggregates under the amendment of the committee?

Mr. VEST. The present area of the park is about 3,300 square miles. It has never been accurately ascertained, but that has been the nearest computation that could be made. This will add to the park in the neighborhood of 2,000 square miles more, a volcanic region, in which no minerals have ever been discovered and which seems useless for any other purpose than that of a national park. It contains a large number of curiosities, objects of wonder, petrified forests among others; and all persons who have been there and have seen it say that ought to be added to the park as it now is; and without this addition there is no safety in regard to the game at all, as they do not come within the present boundaries of the park except during a portion of the year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the time of the Senator from Kansas whom he interrupted has expired.

Mr. VEST. I did not mean to do that.

Mr. INGALLS. I was not aware that this bill was proceeding under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proceeding under Rule VIII.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that there are considerations involved in this bill which would render it desirable to have a more extended discussion than could occur under Rule VIII. I would ask the Senator from Missouri if he would be willing to allow the bill to go over, to be assigned for discussion at a near day in the future?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Missouri can move to proceed to the consideration of the bill. That motion, if carried, dispenses with the five-minute rule.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no preference about the matter myself, but it appears to me that this is a bill of such magnitude and involving such interesting questions that it would hardly be advisable to consider it under a rule limiting debate to five minutes.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I will move to take the bill up without regard to the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Where there is objection the Senator has a right to move to proceed notwithstanding the objection; and if that motion is carried, then the five-minute rule does not apply to the debate.

Mr. INGALLS. Then does the debate extend beyond the hour of 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not. The consideration of the bill would cease at 2 o'clock, but it would remain at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. VEST. I do not want the bill to lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kansas to object to the consideration of the bill under Rule VIII?

Mr. INGALLS. Not in any spirit of hostility to the bill, the Senator from Missouri will understand; but it appears to me that a subject which involves such important considerations as this would be better considered under more extended debate, and I will therefore, if the Senator from Missouri will understand the spirit in which I suggest it, object to the consideration of this bill, but will concur with him in taking it up either at 2 o'clock or at any subsequent time that may suit his convenience best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri, if he choose, may now move to proceed with the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection. That motion is in order.

Mr. VEST. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill will proceed, not subject, however to the five-minute rule. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri, as he has examined this bill very carefully, what is the effect of the provision in the bill with reference to extending the laws of the Territory of Montana over this park. Does it extend the laws of the Territory of Montana over the area embraced within this Yellowstone Park by the provisions of this bill?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir. This bill is intended, and such are its express words, to make the park for jurisdictional purposes a part of the Territory of Montana. It is intended to extend the game laws of Montana over the park and the other territorial statutes as to misdemeanors and other offenses against the laws.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether by the laws of Montana gambling-houses are not licensed in the Territory; and, if so, whether or not that would not authorize the licensing of gaming-houses within this park at any hotel which may be established there.

Mr. VEST. I do not so understand. The Secretary of the Interior has absolute control of that matter. No gambling-houses and no establishment of that sort can exist in the park without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. The bill extends the laws of Montana over the park but it defines for what purpose: "So far as said laws do not conflict with this act." And this act gives to the Secretary of the Interior absolute control as to gambling-houses and all matters of police regulation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. What portion of the bill does the Senator refer to as conferring that power on the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. VEST. The original act of which this is amendatory gave the power, and so does this bill. Section 2 provides:

That all of the territory embraced within the limits of the park as herein established shall be reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasure-ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States; and said territory so set apart shall be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to all the provisions of sections numbered 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except as herein otherwise provided.

The original act designating the park gives the Secretary of the Interior power to make all rules and regulations for police and other purposes in the National Park. There is no doubt on that point.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have not had an opportunity of examining the provisions of the original act with reference to this or any other question involved in the amendment now reported by the committee.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire if the laws of the Territory of Montana are extended in these broad terms over the park how the game laws of Montana will affect the existing laws of the park? The game laws of Montana and the game laws of the park are not identical. Which will prevail in this park if you extend the laws of Montana over the park?

Mr. VEST. The Senator will observe the language of section 6:

The laws of the Territory of Montana are hereby extended over the same, so far as said laws do not conflict with this act.

This act is paramount as any act of Congress would be over an act of a Territorial Legislature, and this law goes on and defines what game shall be protected.

Mr. DAWES. The old act creating the park?

Mr. VEST. No: this bill.

Mr. DAWES. Then so far as the old act has provisions in reference to game——

Mr. VEST. The only provision in the original act referred to in section 2 of this bill, and which is now incorporated in sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes, as to game, is that the Secretary of the Interior shall make such rules as are necessary to protect the game within the park.

Mr. DAWES. So that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. BECK. If I may be allowed a moment before we pass from the bill lately under consideration, I hope that by to-morrow the Senator from Missouri will explain to us why jurisdiction is given to Montana when all the territory of the park is by the changes of boundaries in the Territory of Wyoming. I know the Territory of Wyoming has very stringent game laws and very stringent license laws. I do not know what the laws of Montana are in that regard. As all the territory is in Wyoming and the game laws of Wyoming and the license laws of Wyoming are very stringent and very good and those of Montana may not be, I hope by to-morrow the Senator from Missouri will look into the matter.

Mr. VEST. I will take great pleasure in looking into the matter.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read in full.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The usual course is to consider the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations as the reading progresses. If there be no objection that will be the order now.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope it will be.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment was, after line 24, to insert:

For pay of treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets, in addition to pay as captain of infantry, $700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in line 44, after the word "professors," to strike out "and to officers (on increased rank);" so as to make the clause read:

For additional pay of professors for length of service, $8,898.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "For," in line 126, to insert "extra pay for enlisted man employed in the care and preservation of models, &c. (in lieu of extra-duty pay), $120; for;" and in line 139, after the word "of," to strike out "nine hundred and sixty" and insert "one thousand and eighty;" so as to make the clause read:

For department of drawing: For extra pay of enlisted man employed in the care and preservation of models, &c. (in lieu of extra-duty pay), $120; for fifteen new desks, $150; photographic slides for use in lectures, repairs and construction of racks, models, stretchers, stools and desks, stationery, drawing materials, cardboard for mounting drawings, tacks, hammers, and contingencies, books of reference (mechanical, architectural, surveying, geometry, and art), periodicals on art and technology, models for topographical, free-hand, and constructive drawing, hectograph, rules and triangles, and for shades, rollers, and contingencies for enlargement of drawing academy, $810; in all, $1,080.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 208, to insert:

For completion of new hospital for cadets, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 227, after "bath-tubs," to insert "and repairs to bath-tubs;" and in line 228, before "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional bath-tubs, and repairs to bath-tubs, in cadet barracks, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire on page 2 to offer an amendment to come in after the word "year," in line 36.

Provided, That hereafter any cadet dismissed for hazing shall not be eligible to reappointment.

I will merely say that I was authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to ask consent to offer this amendment in the Senate. I have no remarks to make on it unless somebody wants an explanation of the reason for it.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Illinois if it does not come within the general objection that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose it is not necessary to answer that question. It was understood by the committee that it would be subject to a point of order, but I was authorized by the committee to ask consent to offer it, and I now ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be received notwithstanding the rule. The provision is very important, and it will probably get in nowhere else.

I have conversed with the superintendent at West Point and with quite a number of officers who have been there in charge heretofore and are in charge now, and I believe it is considered that the only way to stop this hazing, as it is commonly termed, is by making it impossible for a cadet to be returned to the academy after he has been dismissed for that offense, and it is thought that character of law will prevent it. The fact is that when a cadet is dismissed for perpetrating this wrong it is very frequently the case that he is reinstated. The Secretary of War has power to reinstate; the President has power to reinstate; cadets can be reinstated by the recommendation of the board at West Point; so that it has not been a very great terror to many persons heretofore to be dismissed for the offense. But if it is enacted into a law that when dismissed for the offense of hazing a cadet shall not be reappointed to the academy, my judgment is that it will forever stop the practice, and that is the judgment of the best officers who have been there. I think it is a very important measure, and I think it ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, unless objection be made to its reception. The Chair hears no objection, and the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. There are no further amendments from the committee or from any member of the committee that I know of.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. LOGAN. Prior to the passage of the bill I desire to submit, that it may go into the RECORD, a statement showing the increases and decreases that have been made in different parts of the bill from the estimates and from the appropriations which have been made heretofore, so that any person wishing to understand it can see at once what changes have been made and what reductions from the estimates.

I do not wish to detain the Senate by reading this statement unless Senators would like to hear it; but if it be proper for me to submit it to be printed in the RECORD, I will do that without reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the statement will be received and printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The statement is as follows:

MILITARY ACADEMY, 1885.

Amount of estimates for 1885		$382,359 53
Amount of bill as passed the House	$308,863 50
Amount of increase made by the Senate committee	6,820 00
Amount as reported to the Senate		315,683 50
The bill, as reported, less than the estimates for 1885		66,676 03
The bill, as reported, less than the act for 1884		2,794 00

The increase made to the House bill by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is as follows:

For pay of treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets, in addition to pay as captain of infantry	$700 00
For extra pay of enlisted man in department of drawing (in lieu of extra-duty pay)	120 00
For additional bath-tubs in cadet barracks	1,000 00
For completion of new hospital for cadets	5,000 00
Total	6,820 00

The changes made by the bill, as reported in the appropriation for 1884, are as follows:

Increase over appropriations for 1884:
Pay of cadets	$10,000
Pay of adjutant, in addition to pay as second lieutenant	100
Pay of treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets, in addition to pay as captain	700

The bill was passed.

JOHN THORNS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule IX.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (S. 167) for the relief of John Thorns.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill that the Secretary is proceeding to read is adversely reported by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], and I think it had better be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such will be the order if there be no objection.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The bill (S. 399) for the relief of Albert H. Emery was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This bill for the relief of Emery was reported from the Committee on Claims by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. He is absent from the Senate, I understand, on account of illness, and I would ask that the bill be passed over informally so that it may not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next bill in order.

JUDICIAL JURISDICTION OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PENDLETON. This bill is quite a long bill. I think it will not give rise to a great deal of discussion, perhaps very little. In my opinion it will conserve the convenience of the Senate if a number of amendments which I am authorized to offer by the Committee on Foreign Relations can be offered as the bill is being read by sections. I do not know whether that requires the unanimous consent of the Senate or a motion, or in what form I shall put that suggestion to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments can be offered as the particular sections are read or they can be proposed now, as the Senator has suggested, by unanimous consent.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to detain the Senate but a moment or two before the consideration of the bill is commenced.

Every subject that is touched by any of the provisions of this bill has been considered very maturely in two special messages from the President of the United States, covering communications to him and recommendations to him from the present and the former Secretary of State. The duty, the power, the obligation, the necessity, and the feasibility of amending some glaring defects in the administration of civil and criminal justice in certain foreign countries in our consular courts has been considered so fully in these public documents which have been in possession of every Senator during this and the last session of Congress and in the discussions which have taken place upon the floor of the Senate within two or three or four years past—one a very exhaustive discussion led by the late Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Carpenter, and participated in by many of the Senators—that I feel unwilling to take up the time of the Senate unless a further necessity shall arise.

This bill was prepared originally in the Secretary of State's office by the then Assistant Secretary, Mr. Bancroft Davis, aided by a very accomplished gentleman there whom most of the Senators know, Mr. O'Connor. The experience of both these gentlemen and their study of these laws and this system have been very great. The glaring defects of the system consist in the great powers of legislation given to the minister, the absence of provisions authorizing appeals, the absence of provisions for jury trials. And the great variety of provisions enacted by the minister into the shape of laws under the provisions of the Revised Statutes have produced such a state of affairs that the defects, as I said before, in the administration of justice are very glaring; and this bill prepared by these gentlemen in the State Department, amended and corrected as I believe and largely improved by the attentive consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations, both at this session and at a previous Congress, will aid very much in the administration of that justice in the most efficient and economical manner. That has been the purpose that the committee had in preparing and presenting this bill. It stands with various amendments as the bill originally sent to us from the State Department.

I am authorized to suggest quite a number of amendments, which are altogether in the line of perfecting and simplifying the bill. I desire for myself to say that I should have liked to go much further in perfecting, as I think, this system. I should have liked to establish constitutional courts, at least to establish courts whose judges were not charged with the performance of consular duties; but it was thought by the committee that this was not perhaps the best time to present so radical a change as that, and they submit the bill as it now is.

I do not desire, unless it shall become necessary in the discussion of the various provisions of the bill, to say more on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill at length.

The Chief Clerk read the first and second sections of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 2, line 3, I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

That the sections of the Revised Statutes from and including 4083 to and including section 4130 be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read section 3 of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 3, line 2, I move to insert "Corea" after "Borneo;" so as to read:

Borneo, Corea, Egypt, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 3, line 3, after the word "Siam," I move to insert "Tripoli;" so as to read:

Muscat, Persia, Samoa, Siam, Tripoli, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to ask, for information, whether the subheading above section 3 reported in the bill is a part of the bill and subject to amendment? If so, it ought to conform to the amendment just made in section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The subheading referred to in this connection is part of the bill, and will have to be amended.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move, then, to amend the subheading by inserting the word "Corea" after "Borneo" and the word "Tripoli" after "Siam," to make it correspond to the text of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection.

Sections 4 and 5 of the bill were read.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 5, line 10, after the word "controversies," I move to strike out the words "between citizens of the United States or others;" so as to read:

Such jurisdiction shall embrace all controversies provided for by this act or by such treaties and capitulations, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read sections 6 and 7 of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 7, line 2, after the word "act," I move to strike out the words "at the port" and to insert the words "within the consular district;" so as to read:

That the consul of the United States in either of the countries mentioned in section 3 of this act, within the consular district for which he is appointed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. At the end of section 7 I move to add:

In civil cases wherein judgment is rendered for more than $200 appeals on questions of law, according to the forms of the code of practice hereinafter provided for, shall be allowed as follows: From the consular courts of Borneo, Corea, Madagascar, Muscat, Persia, Samoa, and Siam, to the supreme court of Japan; from the consular courts of Egypt, Morocco, Tunis, and Turkey, to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of New York. Execution shall not be stayed by reason of such appeal unless the appellant shall execute a bond to the appellee in such sum as shall be fixed by the consular court, with sureties approved by it, conditioned to pay any final judgment that may be rendered against him.

As this is a committee amendment, I will move to modify the amendment of the committee by inserting, after the word "Morocco," the word "Tripoli," to make it correspond to the previous portions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified if there be no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill to the end of section 11.

Mr. PENDLETON. At the end of line 19, section 11, after the word "reviewed," I move to insert "and to which exception has been taken during the trial;" so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the judge in the consular court to certify for review in the proper district court any ruling of law adverse to the accused which he may wish to have reviewed, and to which exception has been taken during the trial.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 12 of the bill was read.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 12 I move to strike out lines 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and the word "Tien-Tsin," in line 18, in the following words:

The consular districts of Canton, Amoy, and Swatow shall constitute the first judicial district, with the seat of the court at Canton; the consular districts of Shanghai, Ningpo, Chin-Kiang, and Foo-Chow shall constitute the second judicial district, with the seat of the court at Shanghai; the consular districts of Tien-Tsin and New-Chwang shall constitute the third judicial district, with the seat of the court at Tien-Tsin.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The consular districts of Canton, Amoy, Foo-Chow, Ningpo, and Swatow shall constitute the first judicial district, with the seat of the court at Canton; the consular districts of Shanghai, Hakow, Chin-Kiang, Tien-Tsin, and New-Chwang shall constitute the second judicial district, with the seat of the court at Shanghai.

The purpose of the amendment is to reduce the judicial districts from three to two for the convenience of the court, as represented by the proper authorities of the State Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 12, line 19, I move to strike out the words "the fourth" and insert "a" before "judicial;" so as to read: "Shall constitute a judicial district, with the seat of the court at Yokahama."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 12, beginning in line 23, I move to strike out the words "the district courts held by the district judge for China, who shall have his principal office," and to insert "each district court in China, one of whom shall have his principal office at Canton and the other;" so as to read:

The President may also, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a clerk for each district court in China, one of whom shall have his principal office at Canton and the other at Shanghai.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 12, line 30, after the word "deputy," I move to insert:

And shall give bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of his duties in such amount as shall be fixed by the Secretary of State, with such sureties as shall be approved by the court. Each clerk and deputy, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe an oath before the district judge to faithfully observe the laws of the United States in force in China or Japan, as the case may be, and to discharge the duties of his office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 12, line 44, I move to strike out the word "each" before "shall" and to insert the words "the interpreter for the second judicial district of China and the interpreter for Japan;" so as to read:

The interpreter for the second judicial district of China and the interpreter for Japan shall also be the interpreter and translator for the supreme court of the country for which he is appointed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 12, at the end of line of 83, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven," so as to make it apply to section 11, which provides for the appeals, and not to section 10, which does not. It is a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read section 13 of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 13, line 44, I move to strike out the word "clerk" and insert "court," so as to read, "with sureties to be approved by the court;" so that the approval of the sureties shall be by the court rather than by the clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 14 of the bill was read.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 14, line 2, after the word "Japan," I move to insert "or in any of the consular courts named in this act;" so as to read:

That a final judgment or decree in any suit in the supreme court of China or Japan, or in any of the consular courts named in this act, &c.

Mr. ALLISON. I have been giving a little attention to this bill. It seems to me that it is a very great enlargement of the powers of the Supreme Court to allow appeals directly from all these consular courts to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is only in certain cases, the Senator will see.

Mr. ALLISON. So I observe; but we have here established, as I understand, consular courts all over the East, and it seems to me the tendency of the bill will be to very greatly extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. I think it would have been well or would be well now to explain in some way to the Senate the general scope and purpose of the bill. Here is a proposition to establish in China and Japan district and supreme courts and consular courts all over the East.

With great respect for the opinions and views of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I do not see how we can carry out this jurisdiction in China and Japan unless with the consent of those governments. Do I understand that we have full power now under existing treaty stipulations to establish just such courts as we choose to establish in those countries?

Mr. PENDLETON. We have the authority to establish all these consular courts and in many of the countries we have authority to establish other courts. If the Senator from Iowa will look at the letter of the Secretary of State of April 29, 1882 (Forty-seventh Congress, first session, Miscellaneous Document No. 89), he will find provisions of treaties with all the countries to which allusion is made in the bill except, I think, Corea, with which a treaty has been negotiated since that time.

I will state to the Senator also that consular courts are now established in all the countries in which new consular courts are by this bill proposed to be established except where new treaties have been negotiated. I will state also that there is no doubt of the power to establish in China and Japan these courts under the treaties we now have. The increase of business, and the facility of communication, the greater number of Americans who are residing in those countries than have been heretofore, and the imperfect administration of justice in those countries when there were only consular courts, induced the provision for the erection of these other courts in China and Japan in order to facilitate the business and interests of American citizens who are residing there. Heretofore there was an appeal to the district court in California from many of those courts.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that. I know perfectly well that we have had consular courts in the East for many years and we have a code regulating the consular court, but I find in the bill a provision to establish abroad courts similar to the courts that we now have in the States of the Union, appointing marshals and clerks, giving compensation, allowing mileage, with all the machinery that now applies to our courts in the several States of the Union. If we have the power under the Constitution to extend this jurisdiction in the way provided in the bill over our citizens in foreign countries, it may be wise to do so; but it is certainly extending to a very great degree the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, it seems to me.

Mr. PENDLETON. In relation to the appointment of marshals, there is no other provision, at least no further provision, than exists already in the law. As to the consular clerks, there is an increase, I should think, of not more than four or five, in order that there may be assignments to the courts in China and Japan. If the Senator will look at the regulations of the Department in relation to consuls, he will find that there is no provision for appointing more marshals or assigning them differently in this bill than there is already. I will state further to the Senator that many of the provisions of the bill are substantially re-enactments of those sections of the Revised Statutes which are hereby repealed.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator does not get the point I make. I understand perfectly well that so far as consular courts are concerned we have regulated them for years; but have we now, except in Egypt, a judge in any foreign country with a defined jurisdiction?

Mr. PENDLETON. Not unless you call the consuls judges, who are appointed to sit in judgment upon the life, liberty, and property, and sometimes without appeal to the President, and to execute judgment as to all those interests. Unless you call them judges, we have none. They are acting judges, and by the law invested with judicial authority.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask a question of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Are the privileges which will be extended to the United States by the bill of establishing courts in China and Japan enjoyed now in those empires by Great Britain or any other power?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir. The system established by France and Great Britain and other nations in those territories is much more elaborate even than that which is provided here, under the stipulations of the treaties with Great Britain and France respectively.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Ohio read the provision of treaty authorizing us to establish these courts in China and Japan? I should like to hear it read.

Mr. PENDLETON. In article 25 of the treaty with China, of July 3, 1844, there is this provision:

All questions in regard to rights, whether of property or person, arising between citizens of the United States in China, shall be subject to the jurisdiction and regulated by the authorities of their own Government. And all controversies occurring in China between citizens of the United States and the subjects of any other government shall be regulated by the treaties existing between the United States and such governments, respectively, without interference on the part of China.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read section 15 of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 15, line 17, after the word "judge," I move to strike out the words "for China, or the district judge for Japan," and to insert "of the district;" so as to read:

With two sureties, to be approved by the district judge of the district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 15, line 19, after the word "consul," I move to insert the word "general;" so as to read, "the consul-general at Bangkok."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 15, line 22, after the word "court," I move to strike out the words "in China or Japan" and to insert the words "of the district;" so as to read, "and a certified copy thereof be lodged in the office of the clerk of the court of the district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 23 the word "consul" should be changed to "consul-general."

Mr. PENDLETON. I have that noted here. In section 15, line 23, after the word "consul," I move to insert the word "general;" so as to read, "or of the consul-general at Bangkok."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 15, line 40, before the word "court," I move to strike out the word "consular;" so as to read:

And executed by such persons as may be appointed for that purpose by the court issuing the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read section 16 of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. In section 16 I move to strike out all after the word "concluded," in line 23, in the following words:

And the necessary amount of money for these purposes is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I do not think that we ought to appropriate any money in the bill. It seems to me that the expenses attending these courts should share the fate of all the other expenses of the Government and be submitted in regular appropriation bills and estimated for by the heads of Departments.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. I am not authorized to accept it on behalf of the committee, but I am satisfied that it will be acceptable to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read sections 17 and 18 of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 17 of section 18 the word "by" is misprinted for "be." It should read "as may be provided."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The text will be corrected as suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

The reading of the bill was resumed at section 19 and continued to the close of section 41.

Mr. PENDLETON. On lines 4, 5, and 6 of section 41 I move to strike out the words "and proceed with a jury of three such citizens; and if it should be impossible to obtain a jury of three, he shall call on three;" and insert "and shall call on;" so as to make the section read:

That if it shall be found impossible to obtain a trial jury of five competent persons among all the citizens of the United States in the consular district, the consul shall enter that fact on the record of his court, and shall call on disinterested persons not citizens of the United States, but otherwise qualified to act as jurors.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to vote against that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 13, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. PENDLETON. Call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and having reached the name of Mr. CALL,

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not insist upon a roll-call; I think there is a quorum present now. If the Chair will glance around he will find a quorum, and we can proceed with the reading of the bill. I understand the Senator from Ohio does not expect a vote to-night on the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. The course suggested will be agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves to suspend the roll-call; is there objection? The Chair hears none, and further call is dispensed with. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to section 41.

Mr. PENDLETON. At the request of a gentleman who sits beside me I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill to the end of section 43.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PENDLETON. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas to allow the reading of the bill to be completed. There is but a page and a half more, and when that is done I shall not ask the Senate to continue longer with the consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the motion on that statement.

The Secretary resumed at section 44 and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, Mr. President, I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suppose that will leave this bill as the unfinished business for 2 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

RECORDS OF THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of February 26, 1884, concerning the distribution of the volumes of the Records of the War of the Rebellion.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the communication will be referred to the Committee on the Library without being printed.

Mr. KEIFER. Unless the communication be of a different nature from what I suppose, I think it should go to the Committee on Printing. In the last Congress the Committee on Printing reported a bill with reference to the distribution of these volumes. Not knowing the character of the letter I can not be certain, but I know that it was the Committee on Printing from which the legislation came.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had the communication marked for reference to the Committee on Printing, but afterward thought it might go to the Committee on the Library. It is immaterial. If there be no objection the communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

There was no objection.

PRINTING AND BINDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention to the necessity of increasing the estimate for printing and binding; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LITTLE KANAWHA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, in compliance with river and harbor act of 1882, containing information concerning provisions of that act affecting the improvements of the Little Kanawha River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

TELEGRAPH LINES OF SUBSIDIZED RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copy of letter from the Commissioner of Railroads concerning telegraph lines belonging to the subsidized railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COOK, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FORAN, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, till Friday next.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of George E. Payne, filed in the Forty-fifth Congress.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a correction of the RECORD. On page 1700 I appear as objecting to a general leave to print remarks on the Mexican war pension bill. I did not object to a general leave, but to a special leave to those who had the floor to add to their remarks to the exclusion of others. I ask now unanimous consent that leave be granted to such as desire to print remarks on that subject.

Mr. DUNN. That is not correcting the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] rises to correct the RECORD and then supplements that by asking unanimous consent that leave be granted to all members who desire to print in the RECORD remarks on the Mexican-war pension bill on which the House voted yesterday.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object. I do not object to those who had the floor having leave to extend their remarks. I object to those who had not the floor having leave to print.

EMPLOYÉS OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. RANDALL. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to submit the report which I send to the desk, and I ask upon it the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to present from the Committee on Appropriations a report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following additional force is hereby authorized to be employed in the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress, to be paid from the contingent fund of the House, namely:

Under the Clerk, one assistant index clerk, at $6 per day; one assistant journal clerk, at $6 per day, from and including February 24, 1884. Under the Doorkeeper, two messengers and three folders, at the rate of $800 each per annum; five pages, including one riding page, at $2.50 each per day.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that we consider that resolution in the House now, for the reason that if it is to be passed at all it should be passed at once, so that there may not be the delay incident to reference to another committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I am acting as the organ of the committee on this matter.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask that it be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, rose.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina be permitted to address the House. How long time does he desire?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I should not have called the previous question on the gentleman from North Carolina if I had known that he desired to speak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina be permitted to address the House for a time not exceeding five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it not in order to have a debate of fifteen minutes on each side after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. That is the rule. It did not occur at the moment to the Chair. Thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes in opposition to it, no debate having been had before the previous question was ordered.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I dislike to oppose the report of the committee, and if I could see the necessity exists for increasing this force I would not present any objection. But we must take this into consideration: this House has now been in session for three months; and in the midst of the session, after we have seen that no great inconvenience obtains from not having more employés, we have the proposition brought here to-day to increase the force. I really am unable to see the necessity for it.

We know that the great bulk of the heavy work for which these employés are proposed now to be employed has been already transacted. And I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact: that whenever this body shows a disposition to increase the number of employés it shows a disposition likewise to increase the expenses of this Government. In making that assertion I will call the attention of the House to a table I have prepared in regard to this matter, which shows the number of employés and expenditures in former Houses.

I do not wish to take as the standard of comparison the number of employés of the last House, because this side of the House uniformly opposed an increase of their number. I prefer to go back to the time when the Democratic party was in control of this House, for the purpose of showing that we did not then have near the number of employés which we have to-day. I will not read the table in full, but will append it to my remarks.

By reference to that table it will be seen that in the year 1876–'77 in the office of Sergeant-at-Arms there were four employés; while in the year 1883–'84, with the same number of members in this House, the number of employés in that office was increased to eight. The number was actually doubled, although the number of Representatives was the same. Now, in regard to the employés in connection with the committees; let us see about them. In 1876–'77, when the Democratic party came into power in this House, there were thirty clerks and employés of committees. In 1882–'83, when we had no more members of the House than in previous Congresses, the number of those employés was increased to fifty-one. The expense for those employés was increased from $43,000 a year in 1877–'78 to $74,000 a year in 1883–'84.

Turn to the Doorkeeper's department. In that department under Democratic administration there were one hundred and thirty-six employés, costing $122,000 annually. That number was increased from Congress to Congress until in the last Congress there were one hundred and fifty-two employés in that department, costing $134,000 annually. And so in regard to the post-office department of this House. The number in that department has been increased from time to time until the number employed in the Forty-seventh Congress were twelve.

And it is a fact to be noticed that when this House is regardless of its expenses it shows a corresponding indifference to the expenses of the other departments of the Government. In 1876–'77, when there was a Democratic majority in this House, the expenses of the Government were $144,000,000 annually. In 1882–'83, under Republican rule, those expenses amounted to $219,000,000; and in 1883–'84, to $295,000,000. We see, therefore, that when there is a disposition here to increase the number of our employés we are forgetful of the expenditures in the other departments of the Government.

Abuses have crept in here which demand correction, as there are abuses in all the departments of the Government which should be corrected. And if we are to commence reforms, we should commence here in this House. We know that on account of the number of employés, and the amount of compensation which they receive, there has been a growing desire in every Congress to secure places, and every member of the House has been pursued, run down, by applicants for such places. Men have come here seeking these positions, while disgrace and scandal have fallen upon the House.

Mr. LONG. Does not the increase in the number of employés increase the inefficiency?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. It is not the number of employés that regulates the matter of efficiency, but the manner in which they discharge their duties and the character of the persons employed. I am satisfied that we now have men here who are doing nothing, who are filling sinecure positions. I am a member of the Committee on the Militia. Three months of this session have passed and the clerk of that committee has been drawing pay at the rate of from $180 to $186 a month. Yet we have never had a meeting of the committee, and I very much doubt if we ever do have over one or two. Still, at the end of the year the clerk of that committee will have drawn $1,500, and received besides probably an extra month's pay. This is not intended to reflect upon this clerk, who discharges all the duties of his office. It is proper to state that this clerk is also clerk of the Committee on Mileage, where he is supposed to have performed some labor. I refer to it simply as an example. The same rule prevails in regard to the other committees to a great extent. It was on that account that early in the session I called for a report to show the number of our employés, the nature of their duties, and the hours they were employed. I would pursue the same rule in regard to the employés of the House here that a man would apply in the transaction of his own private business. This seems to me to be my duty as a Representative of the people whose interests I wish to protect.

I think that at this time we have an ample force of employés, if they were only required to discharge their duties and devote their time to the service of the House. It is true that the number of Representatives here has increased; but how does that affect the matter? We know that the only additional labor required is to provide for the printing of a few more bills, and probably we may need a few more pages. But there is only a certain amount of business that can be done by this House. At the close of the last Congress there were thousands of bills that had never been acted on. We are accumulating work here which we know we can not attend to. Yet we go on in a careless manner increasing the number of employés, although we are fully aware that we have on this side of the House charged the other side with extravagance in this very direction.

We are expected to inaugurate reforms, and we should do so. We know that nepotism—the pensioning of relations and kindred upon the public—has crept into all the departments of the Government. Favoritism and abuses are in them all, yet no stop has been put to them, but on the contrary, if anything, they are increasing. We can not actually have a burial of a deceased Congressman without some disgrace attaching to it on account of extraordinary expenditures. No investigation has been made because it is painful and unpleasant to allude to such matters. But the people expect it of us and it is our duty to do it. It is at this time almost discreditable for a member of this House to take part in one of these mournful ceremonies; painful to discharge our duties to the memory of those we respect and revere, because of the extravagance and wastefulness that occur on such occasions.

In view of this fact, I say that we should have good and cogent reasons for increasing the number of our employés before this Democratic House shall give its assent to any such proposition. We should see to it that such increase is actually necessary. I have as yet heard nothing in regard to that subject which satisfies me.

One word more. I know such a policy as I advocate is subject to criticisms from the friends of waste and extravagance. But I would rather pursue a policy that would more correctly and honestly administer the affairs of the Government than one which may lead to star-route frauds, Howgate crimes, and whisky-ring corruptions. We who are administering the Government, know that what I advocate is in the line of economy and fair administration, while the opposite policy carried too far leads to corruption and extravagance and brings disgrace upon this House and the country.

I will publish the table which I have referred to, and reserve the remainder of my time until I hear something said on the other side in regard to this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. It is right, Mr. Speaker, that this House should understand the origin of this proceeding in so far as the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned. It will be remembered that the last Congress provided for the appointment of a joint committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, with a view to equalizing the salaries of the employés of the two Houses, there having existed a great disparity in the amount of their pay and a greater difference in the amount of labor performed, the House employés doing considerably more work as a general rule than the corresponding officers of the Senate.

This joint committee reported their inability to agree upon any system of equalization, but the House members of the committee made recommendation that the force of the House employés should be increased, in view of the enlarged membership and additional work required. This communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, a subcommittee of which considered the subject and made report to the general committee. The report now before the House is the result.

The report from the three House members of the joint committee was unanimous. Their recommendation would involve an increase of the permanent officers of the House at an increased annual expense of about $13,000. The proposition now reported as the result of the action of the Committee on Appropriations, and upon which I propose to stand firmly, decreases the number of additional officers recommended by the House members of the joint committee and diminishes the proposed increase of expense from $13,000 to $6,000. It also negatives the recommendation that these additional employés should be permanent officers, and provides that they shall be only temporary.

It was stated with great earnestness and full conviction by those who had examined the subject—I did not—that these additional officers are now needed. Hence we have recommended the increase now proposed. I confess I was originally against any increase whatever; but, as in like cases, I was brought to the advocacy of this provision rather than permit so large an increase as was recommended in the report of the House members of the joint committee. This is the condition of things now presented. The Doorkeeper of the House alleges more messengers are required because of the increased membership of the present House of Representatives over those which have preceded it. He tells us there are five doors on this floor where three messengers each are necessary, which would make an increase of fifteen on this floor, and that in addition to those which are required in the galleries. The proposed increase is two messengers for the balance of this fiscal year.

Now, as to the Journal Clerk, the increase there the House has already provided for. We have been running for years without provision of permanent law allowing an assistant to the Journal Clerk. This merely makes permanent what heretofore has been temporary, and as I have already said, the House by resolution has already provided for this increase.

Provision for an assistant index clerk is quite as necessary as that for an assistant Journal Clerk, because if you do not have full labor in getting out the index we should be much delayed in receiving the index of Congress. It might perhaps be delayed until next December before we should receive the index prepared by this clerk of the proceedings of this session of Congress.

I have, therefore, Mr. Speaker, reconciled myself to this increase, which I have indicated in detail, for the reasons I have stated, rather than be compelled to consent to the excessive increase which might otherwise be forced upon the House. I hope this report will be adopted in that view, as a matter of economy as well as a matter of good legislation in making permanent what otherwise has been temporary. If this be not granted I fear there will be much larger increase of the permanent force than what is now reported, and that we may be compelled to vote an increase, as suggested by the joint committee of the two Houses, from the $6,000 we indicate to the $13,000 proposed by that committee. I hope, therefore, the report will be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. RANDALL. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois. Is that enough?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I shall have five minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the report referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as coming from the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress appointed at the last session recommended a much larger increase than is proposed by the pending report from the Committee on Appropriations. That joint committee of the two Houses was composed of two members on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], and one member from this side of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

The Clerk of the present House of Representatives was elected, I believe, by the vote of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX], and the Doorkeeper of the present House was elected also by the gentlemen on that side. Now, these two officers, elected by the other side, came before the Committee on Appropriations and made allegation that it was absolutely necessary not only for the execution of their duties to have the increase of force we recommend, but a very much larger one. And they specified wherein the increase they asked for was required.

It would be, of course, impossible for me, Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to spend a month's time in going around and inquiring of every employé under the Clerk and Doorkeeper to learn whether he was or was not doing his full duty. I thought perhaps something was due to these two officers to whom you have given your confidence. It is true it was not my purpose in consenting to this report to vindicate them, but it is my purpose as a member of this House to see to it that the work of the House is promptly and efficiently done, not only in the office of the Clerk but in the folding-room under the Doorkeeper. It is patent to me in the transaction of my business as a member that the work in the folding-room is not promptly and properly done. Your Doorkeeper, elected by your side of the House, says the reason is he has not enough men to do it as it should be done. Then one of two things ought to be done. Either you ought to investigate to see whether the Clerk or Doorkeeper are doing their work properly or you ought to give them this increase which they say is necessary. I am not here asking for an investigation, for so far as I know concerning those two officers they are good officers. For one, I am willing to back their word, and have agreed to this report for this increase. But it may be the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] has knowledge that would justify him in rising in his place and moving an investigation against these parties for inefficiency. If so, I have no doubt he will take pleasure in doing so, and that is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. RANDALL. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the merits of this resolution outside of that which pertains to the folding-room. Here I have a little interest. Some time ago I subscribed for twenty extra copies of the Congressional Directory in addition to the number to which I was entitled as a member of the House. Now, those twenty extra copies I have received some days ago, having paid cash for them. They were folded in the folding-room and are now no doubt in the hands of my constituents; but the twenty copies to which I was entitled as a member of the House under the law I have not been able to get out of the folding-room by love, coaxing, or in any other way.

Why this condition of affairs exists I certainly do not know. But I give the folding-room all the presumption that every man is entitled to, that it is efficiently and honestly conducted; and therefore I am bound to assume that they have not a sufficient working force to carry on the business promptly. For that reason I think it is only proper that we should grant the additional force provided in this resolution.

I would like, I must confess, Mr. Speaker, to understand why it is that when I send an order for my regular number of documents I can not get them folded; and yet I can go out here into the Rotunda and see the agent of the Government Printing Office, buy any number of extra copies that I may desire, pay my money for them, and send them down and get them folded without delay. I think the reason is, perhaps, that the documents are not placed to the credit of members until they are folded; and that these, not having been yet folded, have not been placed to my credit. But I must confess that it struck me as a little singular when I found that I could go down, pull out my pocket-book, pay my money, and get my directories folded promptly and send them to Iowa, but could not get even one of those that I am entitled to under the law. I think we had better arm the folding-room, therefore, with such additional force as is necessary to meet the requirements.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be understood as fault-finding. I do not wish my remarks to be so construed. I believe the real solution of the difficulty is in the fact that the force is inadequate. I asked the agent of Mr. Rounds here why it was that these documents were not delivered or whether they had been delivered yet to the document-room. His response was: "Yes; they were delivered to the folding-room before you got those that you purchased." So I know that the documents are in the folding-room, and that they have not been placed to my credit for some reason. In order to do the folding-room no injustice, or the officers in charge of it rather, it is only proper that I should say further that there are gentlemen—Democrats—on this floor who are in the same fix as myself. I do not, therefore, mean to intimate that favors are granted to one side and not to the other.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will let me suggest, perhaps the difficulty may arise from the fact that these directories have just been printed and they have had hardly time to fold them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That could hardly be the case, because those that I purchased I have had for a long time comparatively, and there was no trouble in getting them folded. I think the reason that I have asserted is a correct one.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to occupy the time until I hear from the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina will be recognized for the remainder of his time, four minutes.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in replying to the gentlemen who have discussed this matter, I find that the one reason urged by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] for an increase of force is because he fails to receive with regularity documents from the folding-room. The reason for that failure I am unable to state. It may be that there is an unusual pressure brought to bear upon the employés by reason of the number of documents at this period in the session.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that they proceeded in the Committee on Appropriations upon the statement of the officers of this House, and in accordance therewith made this recommendation for an increase. I presume the committee did as stated; but we know the pressure that is often brought in regard to such additional employés; the pressure that is brought upon the officers of the House to favor their friends by additional appointments. But I am not dealing now with any question of that kind. I do not care whether the officer making the application be a Democrat or Republican, I propose simply to deal with the facts as I find them; and, as I have shown, under Democratic administrations the number of these employés was much less than it is to-day, even without this proposed increase. Where does the necessity exist? It is no answer to my objection to say that this additional force has been asked for by a Democratic officer. What we want is that members of the committee making this recommendation shall give us facts and tell us the exact number of the officers and employés of the House to-day, and their duties. We have these facts so far as the numbers are concerned in past Congresses. Now let us have the exact facts to-day, from which we can draw our own conclusions.

My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] speaks of this proposed increase as being a sort of compromise on account of the complications existing between the difference in pay of the Senate and House employés; that the Senate have in proportion to their numbers a larger roll of employés and pay them more than the House for similar services. That has nothing to do with our action. We are to act independently of that body and say what force is absolutely necessary to perform the public business connected with the House of Representatives alone. We are responsible to those who send us here for our action and they are responsible for theirs. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] goes on further and says that he accepts this proposed increase as a choice between two evils, and that he takes the lesser of them. That may also be true; but since he concedes that the evil exists it is not any answer to the objection which I make, nor does it remedy the difficulty by increasing the number of the employés and enlarging the evils that arise from superfluous numbers. Now, if there be a real necessity for this increase, let that necessity be shown, and I will sustain the report. Nothing so far has been shown that justifies it as far as I have seen. I am certainly not in favor of employing persons unnecessarily in this House, nor am I in favor of refusing the employment of those whose services are necessary. But governed as I am by the light of the past and knowing the number of employés in other Congresses, knowing also how they have steadily increased, I fail to see the necessity for this further addition recommended by the committee. No facts which have been laid before us by the members of the committee, no report that they have written, show the necessity for this increased force; and therefore I can see no reason for changing my mind or adopting any other than the original impression that I had when this resolution was first presented here.

I now append this table, which sustains the position maintained by me:

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. The principal difficulty in regard to the employés of the House seems to arise in the Doorkeeper's department. The number of persons now employed, including pages and the soldiers' roll, is one hundred and forty-three. The number of persons required to remain at the doors would seem to be about thirty; the number of laborers, eighteen; the number of pages, twenty-nine. This leaves about sixty-six persons who I think can be employed in the folding-room, and I should suppose, without being familiar with the details of that branch of the service of the House, that that force was sufficient.

I wish to state, however, that I acquiesce in the report now made to the House on the ground mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], that, so far as the action of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, it is a question between the large force recommended by the House portion of the joint committee and the force recommended by the report made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am not prepared and I do not pretend to say that this increased force is required. In my judgment the number of employés, taking into account the number of persons employed in connection with various committees as clerks, is far beyond the requirements of the service of the House. But as between the two propositions, that now submitted being far more favorable and reasonable than the other proposition, I have given it my acquiescence.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield now to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. The only point made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] against the reports of two commissions of this House, one of the former Congress and one of the present Congress, is that the Committee on Militia has a clerk and he has nothing to do. I suggest to that gentleman that he assemble his committee at least once this session, and that they report that fact to the House and ask that that clerk be taken off the list.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I am not chairman of the committee. I would do that if I could.

Mr. ELLIS. That that committee has nothing to do and that that clerk is not required is no reason why the important business of this House should not be transacted in a manner commensurate with its size and dignity before the country.

We have the deliberate statements of two trusted officers of this House that this increase of force is absolutely necessary; ay, more than even is admitted by the Committee on Appropriations.

In the Thirty-first Congress an assistant journal clerk was first employed; and he was steadily employed and borne on the rolls of this House as an officer of the House until the Forty-fourth Congress. Then he was taken off. What has been the condition since? The work has had to be done. One journal clerk could not do it. And the result is we have gone from pillar to post and paid an assistant journal clerk out of the contingent fund and by special appropriations in deficiency bills; but he has been employed and paid all the time. All we ask now is that he shall be put on the roll and paid regularly during the session. That is the fact in regard to the assistant journal clerk.

As regards the index clerk, one clerk is attending to the index of the House; and I am told by the experienced Journal Clerk that after this session closes he will have to index the Journal, the reports of committees, and all the miscellaneous documents, and that unless he has an assistant it will be the dead of next winter before the index of this session of Congress is prepared. Even now, I am told by the clerk that he is compelled to work at it until 12 o'clock at night in order to get even the index of the RECORD out for the use of members. Is not this a nice state of affairs in conducting the business of the House of Representatives of fifty millions of people?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask that the statements of the Clerk and the Doorkeeper be published as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to have those communications published as a part of his remarks.

The letters of the Clerk of the House and the Doorkeeper are as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 14, 1884.

SIRS: I deem it proper to make the following statement in regard to the necessity of additional assistance to the Journal Clerk, the bill and printing clerk, and the index clerk, and to say that it will be next to impossible for these clerks to discharge the increasing duties incumbent upon them unless this additional force is granted.

ASSISTANT TO JOURNAL CLERK.

In the Thirty-first Congress (commencing December, 1849) an assistant was first assigned to the Journal Clerk, and from that time until the close of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress (the 15th of August, 1876) was one of the regular employés of the Clerk's office, receiving in 1856 compensation of $1,800 and in 1876 $3,000 per annum.

In the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress the appropriation for an assistant journal clerk was omitted, and the Journal Clerk alone kept the Journal, with the occasional assistance of other clerks during the second session of the Forty-fourth, all of the Forty-fifth, the first session of the Forty-sixth, and part of the second session of the Forty-sixth, when it became necessary to employ an assistant, who has since been regularly employed, and paid either out of the contingent fund of the House or by specific appropriations in the sundry civil or deficiency bills at the close of each session.

From the first session of the Thirtieth Congress the Journal has steadily increased in volume. In that Congress (composed of 232 members) the Journal numbered 1,294 pages while the Journal of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress (composed of 293 members) numbered 1,909 pages without the index.

Under the present rules, requiring every bill to go to a calendar before consideration, the work of the Journal Clerk has more than doubled over that required twenty years ago, and it is simply a physical impossibility for one clerk to perform the duties required. With an assistant it is necessary for the Journal Clerk to return to the Capitol at least four evenings out of each week in order to have the Journal ready at 12 o'clock the next day—often engaged to 2 o'clock.

In addition to the ordinary duties of the Journal Clerk, he is also called upon to perform a considerable amount of miscellaneous work for the Speaker, committees, and members, which occupies considerable time, and which from the nature of his position can not be performed by any other clerk.

As to the assistant to the bill and printing clerk, the work of this clerk has steadily increased, and since the Thirty-eighth Congress an assistant has been assigned him.

The following table, giving the number of bills and joint resolutions from the Thirty-eighth to the present Congress, will show how the work of this clerk has increased:

Congress.	Bills.	Joint resolutions.	Total.
Thirty-eighth	813	182	995
Thirty-ninth	1,234	305	1,539
Fortieth	2,023	476	2,499
Forty-first	3,091	522	3,613
Forty-second	4,073	203	4,276
Forty-third	4,891	162	5,053
Forty-fourth	4,708	196	4,094
Forty-fifth	6,549	250	6,799
Forty-sixth	7,257	419	7,676
Forty-seventh	7,635	367	8,052

Up to this date (February 13) 4,988 bills have been introduced and reported, and 159 joint resolutions, an increase of 782 bills and joint resolutions over the corresponding period in the Forty-seventh Congress.

In addition to this increase of bills and joint resolutions, the reports have increased from 174 in the Thirty-eighth Congress to 2,044 in the Forty-seventh Congress, which alone added so much to the duties of this desk that it was found necessary to transfer the work connected with what is known as executive and miscellaneous documents to the newspaper clerk.

In addition to the foregoing increased duties of this desk, the printing and bill clerk is required to prepare for the Printer amendments of the Senate to all House bills which are ordered printed, the work on the general appropriation bills alone being very considerable, requiring the greatest care in order to insure accuracy.

In order to perform this work, which is required to be promptly and expeditiously done, it has been found necessary to transfer an employé from the Clerk's document-room, the services of which employé can not be longer spared from the document-room on account of the steady increase of work in that department.

As to assistant to index clerk: In the Thirty-ninth Congress an index clerk was first appointed, prior to which time the Journal had been indexed by the Journal Clerk and his assistant, with the occasional assistance of other clerks.

In the Forty-first Congress the work had so increased that an assistant was appointed to the index clerk, and so continued until the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, when the appropriation for such assistant was omitted.

As a result the indexes to the Journals have not been completed for many months after adjournment, except in the second and third sessions of the Forty-sixth Congress, when the index clerk was compelled to employ assistance and pay $825 out of his own pocket, which was reimbursed to him in the deficiency bill of the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress. (See Statutes, volume 22, page 593.)

The index to the Journal of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress—which session terminated on the 5th of August, 1882—was not completed until early in December, after the commencement of the second session, and the volume was not printed until the middle of January, 1883; and the index to the Journal of the second session, which terminated March 3, 1883, was not completed and printed until just prior to the commencement of the present session.

The indexes, owing to the large increase in the number of bills and petitions, has increased from one hundred and sixty pages in the first session of the Thirtieth Congress to four hundred and sixty-nine pages in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The index clerk is required to index the Journal, the executive and miscellaneous documents, and reports of committees, and in order to secure the speedy completion of these volumes for the Printer an assistant is absolutely required.

Very respectfully,

JNO. B. CLARK, JR.,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

To the SUBCOMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Having under consideration increase of force in Clerk's office.

GENTLEMEN: In consequence of the large increase in the number of members of the House, the increase of committees, business, &c., it is absolutely necessary that the force in the Doorkeeper's department be increased. There are fifty-four committees, occupying forty-four committee-rooms, and these rooms must be attended to and served.

The present force contains but eighteen able-bodied messengers. Three of these are detailed for service on the floor of the House, in reporters' gallery, and seal-room, respectively. There are left but fifteen of these messengers; these, with the fourteen crippled and disabled men who are on "the soldiers' roll," make twenty-nine in all to attend to said committee-rooms and serve said committees.

There are twenty doors to be attended, five of which on the House floor require three men each; four doors in the gallery require two each; and the rest one each—thus taking in all, for absolute duty at the doors, thirty-four men, when, as before stated, there are now only twenty-nine men allowed for this service; and it is found necessary to detail pages and laborers to make up the deficiency in the force, and thus cause them to do double duties and different from those they are employed to perform.

In the document and folding rooms the documents have increased 30 per cent. over last Congress, and the demand for increased force in these two departments is necessary.

It is absolutely necessary that the folding-room have an additional clerk and more folders. If two laborers, at $720 per annum, are allowed for document-room an additional clerk will not be necessary.

At least six additional pages are required.

By reference to the RECORD, No. 16, January 9, pages 327 and 328, the Doorkeeper's statement to Hons. FRANK HISCOCK, J. C. S. BLACKBURN, and WILLIAM H. FORNEY, members of the joint commission on the part of the House to arrange an increase of force and salaries, will be seen, and the recommendation of that commission in relation thereto.

Respectfully submitted.

J. G. WINTERSMITH,
Doorkeeper.

To Hons. W. S. HOLMAN, JOHN HANCOCK, and JOSEPH CANNON, Subcommittee on Legislative Bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 124, noes 27.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. This is clearly not in the interest of economy. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 15; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has twenty-two minutes of his time left.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I desire afterward to yield a portion of the time to my colleague [Mr. COX].

Mr. RANDALL. I will take as little time as possible and yield to the gentleman from New York as soon as I can.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, Mr. COX.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am not perhaps so well-fitted to speak on this subject as those gentlemen who have made it their special study; but perfunctorily, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I may be expected to give some judgment, although it may not be the judgment of the committee—that only of myself. There seems to be just now a proposition which might be briefly stated, and which I have written down and elaborated it so as to make it concise, somewhat like this:

It is said by some gentlemen, "either reduce your official roster or build more ships." Rather build ships to keep officers employed, or dismiss the superfluous officers. There is some wisdom in this alternative. It was well elaborated by my colleague of the Naval Committee [Mr. THOMAS]. He favored more ships, and yet he found the Navy top-heavy with officials. My position is that it would be well to cut down the naval official force. The present four cruisers are to be finished, and, when tested, we can tell what more to do—or more than to make specifications. Congress meets in December, and if then the cruisers already ordered turn out to be in good form, of some speed, and of real utility, then we can consider the increase.

There is one impediment now to the creation of a navy. It is the constant contention and wrangling in the Department as to staff and line, as to consolidation of bureaus, and as to the methods to be adopted for the construction of vessels. Even the present energetic head of the Department has had much trouble to reconcile these differences.

Since the year 1866 over $385,000,000 have been expended by the United States on its Navy Department. To-day we are without a single ship fit to cope with any of the great ironclads of the maritime powers. Now it is proposed after the expenditure of this enormous sum to commence the building of a navy. In the condition to which our commerce has been reduced it must be apparent to every gentleman that a navy for the purpose of its protection would be a most expensive and unnecessary luxury. If we need any war ships in our present condition, it must be for home defense, not for foreign aggression. For this purpose it is proposed to build cruisers of three classes and some gunboats. I do not see any wisdom in this proposition. Such ships, it will be admitted, would be little if any better for actual warfare than those now in our possession. The cruisers, as the name implies, are adapted only to destroy unarmed ships—merchantmen. The destruction of such vessels can be justified only on the principle of retaliation—a principle at variance with civilization and humanity.

The idea of William L. Marcy is my best thought on this theme. On the 3d of March, 1862, I introduced resolutions looking to the vindication of these ideas. These were crystallized in this form. To their consideration I addressed myself in the light of progress and international law.

These are the resolutions:

That it favors the most liberal propositions with respect to maritime rights and the abolition of such usages as restrict the liberty of neutrals and multiply the causes of dissension in the world, believing that humanity and justice demand that the calamities incident to war should be strictly limited to the belligerents themselves and to those who voluntarily take part with them; but that neutrals abstaining in good faith from such complicity ought to be left to pursue their ordinary trade with either belligerent.

That the present time is propitious for the resumption of negotiations to secure these objects, and especially for the concurrence of the nations in the benignant articles of the declaration of the congress of Paris of the 16th of April, 1856, with the amendment proposed by Mr. Marcy, namely: 1. Privateering is and remains abolished, provided that the private property of the subjects or citizens of a belligerent on the high seas shall be exempted from seizure by public armed vessels of the other belligerent, except it be contraband. 2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war. 3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under the enemy's flag. 4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective.

That the people of the United States entertain the hope that the great maritime powers of France and England, relinquishing their present objections growing out of their ill-advised recognition of our insurgent States as belligerents, will consent to the propositions of the Paris conference, as the United States have so constantly invited, and as Mr. Marcy proposed to the Government of France on the 28th day of July, 1856; with such a liberal expansion of them that the private property, not contraband, of citizens and subjects of nations in collision should be exempted from confiscation equally in warfare waged on the land and in warfare waged upon the seas, which are the common highways of the nations.

That the efforts of the late Secretary Marcy and the present Secretary of State to have these maxims ingrafted as fixed principles of international law were eminently wise and just, sanctioned by our traditionary policy, and conducive to the welfare of the Republic and to the highest interests of peace and civilization.

These principles may be summarized in a few words: that we would save from spoliation private property. The principle is the salvation of private property from destruction. The mode of its destruction, whether by public or private armed cruisers, is the incident. This principle of William L. Marcy was the principle of Hugo Grotius, who received its natural justice from a higher source! And now shall we change all this? Change it for what? To gratify whom? What?

In warfare on land it has long been the custom to protect private property from seizure and destruction. Why not? Where is the reason for the discrimination? It is private property wherever it is, on one element or another. I desire to see our Government committed as far as possible to this custom. It is international law. I can not approve the proposition to commence the building of an American navy with ships that dare not meet in equal combat the ironclads of any power with which we might be at war, and that would only venture to open their ports on unarmed merchantmen. I can see no good reason against the adoption of an international rule of warfare under which private property on the high seas shall be as much respected as it is on land; but whether the adoption of such a rule is near or distant, I see no present necessity on our part to begin a Navy with commerce-destroyers.

We have no commerce worth speaking of, and that we have none is not due to the absence of a navy. The laws that destroyed our commerce remain unrepealed on our statute-book, and while they remain in force foreign ships will continue to carry our commerce. When I see some probability of repealing these laws I will then begin to think of the advisability of building ships for the protection of commerce. I do not think it an advisable method to cut down our surplus revenue by throwing away a few millions of dollars per annum after the $385,000,000 already sunk or squandered, with the continued result of a navy composed of vessels unfit to cope with any of the armored vessels of even the second or third rate maritime powers of the world.

In our peculiar situation we are not likely to provoke war or be provoked into war with any of the great powers of the world, and if war were to be declared at any time within the next ten years, our position would, with such ships as are proposed to be built, be necessarily one of defense.

It is claimed that our seaports would, in case of war, be at the mercy of the enemy. In this view of the case it would seem to me to be a question of guns and torpedoes rather than ships. Given equal caliber, range, and power of penetration, a gun in a land battery must be better for defense than a like gun on that modern floating battery, an ironclad war ship. If the object is the defense of our ports, it seems to me that we should direct our attention to forts and guns rather than to a few steel commerce-destroyers. If our naval officers must have some sort of employment, let them turn their attention to harbor defense until such time as commerce requires the countenance of our flag on the high seas.

We have been eighteen years without a navy, and yet there was not once in that time a moment when any of the great powers of Europe would have dared to declare war against us. Why was this the case? One answer is, because we had no commerce to be attacked, and war with us meant a land war with the greatest military power of the world. War with us now on the part of any of the great powers of the world would mean an interruption of the commerce of that power with us—an interruption by which we would suffer less loss than the enemy.

I am utterly opposed to any useless or unnecessary expenditure of public money, especially so at the present time, when all sorts of schemes are being suggested for the purpose of defeating legislation looking to the reduction of our annual revenue. If money for the defense of the country is needed, I am ready now, as I always have been, to vote millions for that purpose; but I am not blind to the fact that the building of war ships has not yet reached the stage of scientific development, and that their construction is still a matter of experiment and contention even in the Department. The present idea of a first-class ship of war is a floating battery designed to carry the most powerful guns and to resist the shot of the enemy; the gun is the ruling idea and the ship is merely the gun-carriage. The ship that has the best armor, the highest speed, and the guns of longest range and greatest power of penetration is, according to present ideas, the best adapted for warfare—for attack as well as defense.

This is not the sort of ship you propose to construct. You propose to build ships that would be as useless against such a war vessel as any wooden hulk that now lies rotting in our navy-yard. Of course it would be very agreeable for our admirals and commodores to be able to display their flags on fast-sailing steel cruisers in foreign ports in time of peace; but are we called upon at present by any urgent necessity to afford these officers such an expensive gratification of vanity? It would be very humiliating to our national pride to have such ships depend on their speed for their safety in case a war were declared against us.

I remember that in the month of April, 1862, when General McClellan was moving the army to the Peninsula, and several corps of that army were on transports under the guns of Fortress Monroe and the Atlantic fleet, a single ship, the Merrimac, armed with a few guns, protected with casemates of railroad iron, sailed out of the Elizabeth River one fine morning, accompanied by two small tenders, the Yorktown and Jamestown. In presence of the whole army of the Potomac this iron-clad made our Atlantic fleet take to its heels, while the little Monitor hugged the shore under the guns of Fortress Monroe, notwithstanding the challenge of a couple of blank guns from the Merrimac. That harbor, which at sunrise was like the bay of Salamis, fleeted with a thousand ships, within an hour was cleared. Nothing remained in it but the Merrimac and her tenders and a French and English man-of-war, each of which manned its yards as the Merrimac cruised past firing her blank guns of challenge. I do not want a navy that would have to submit to such mortification as this; and it is such ships that are now proposed to be built, and none others.

You can not have a navy worthy of our country without seamen to man it, and you can not have American seamen unless you have a commercial marine. We know that there are not more than 5 per cent. of our seamen of American nativity. You have destroyed our merchant service with tariffs and other exactions that prohibit any participation on our part in the carrying trade of the world. A commercial marine is the nursery of seamen. No one desires a navy more than I do, but I desire no navy of "commerce-destroyers." Let us devise a plan to regain the commerce we have lost before we talk of "cruisers," that will be fit only for pleasure yachts for our admirals and commodores. When the principle of the democracy of the sea becomes a part of our polity we shall not require much expenditures for sea-service. Then the better time may come when "seas will but join the nations they divide."

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill has been closed. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes:

For the pay of the Navy, for the active-list, namely: For 1 Admiral, 1 Vice-Admiral, 8 rear-admirals, 7 chiefs of bureaus, 21 commodores, 45 captains, 87 commanders, 78 lieutenant-commanders, 272 lieutenants, 95 junior lieutenants, 95 ensigns, 98 junior ensigns, 14 medical directors, 15 medical inspectors, 50 surgeons, 79 passed assistant surgeons, 8 assistant surgeons, 2 assistant surgeons not in the line of promotion (who shall hereafter, after fifteen years' service, be entitled to receive, as annual pay, when at sea, $2,100, when on shore-duty $1,800, and when on leave or waiting orders $1,600), 13 pay directors, 12 pay inspectors, 49 paymasters, 29 passed assistant paymasters, 20 assistant paymasters, 69 chief engineers, 93 passed assistant engineers, 78 assistant engineers, 24 chaplains, 11 professors of mathematics, 10 naval constructors, 9 assistant naval constructors, 10 civil engineers, 188 warrant officers, 38 mates, 295 naval cadets; in all, $3,714,150. Hereafter none of the vacancies in the various grades in the line and in the staff corps of the Navy shall be filled by promotion until such grades shall be reduced to the numbers fixed for the several grades of the line and the staff corps of the Navy by the act of August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALKINS. I raise the point of order on the last clause of the paragraph just read. I refer to the clause reading as follows:

Hereafter none of the vacancies in the various grades in the line and staff corps of the Navy shall be filled by promotion until such grades shall be reduced to the numbers fixed for the several grades of the line and staff corps of the Navy by the act of August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Clause 3 of Rule XXI provides that no new legislation shall be ingrafted on any appropriation bill unless the provision of itself, on its face, shall reduce expenditures. What is the true construction of that clause of the rule? It provides that there shall be no change of existing law, no new legislation put in an appropriation bill, unless that new legislation of itself, standing alone, will reduce expenditures.

Now it will be seen that this bill makes an appropriation for the pay of all the officers of the Navy, and the appropriation will be just the same whether this clause to which I have objected remains in the bill or is stricken out. That will not make one single cent of difference, for the bill appropriates the money for the pay of these officers, and the amount appropriated will be just the same whether this clause remains in the bill or goes out. Hence it is obnoxious to that provision of the rule which says there shall be no change of existing law, no new legislation in an appropriation bill, unless the substantive proposition so inserted in the bill shall of itself reduce the expenditures carried by the bill. That is all I desire to say on the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. On the point of order, I admit that the provision in this bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations may not reduce the amount of the appropriation carried by the bill; but it certainly will reduce the amount of expenditures.

Mr. CALKINS. Not under this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The law of last year contains the following provision:

Hereafter only one-half of the vacancies in the various grades in the staff corps of the Navy shall be filled by promotion until such grades shall be reduced to the numbers fixed for the several grades of the staff corps of the Navy by the act of August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The clause in the bill under consideration is the same as that in the bill of last year, except that we use the word "none" instead of the words "only one-half." Now let me read the rule:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill—

This certainly is germane—

shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Notice the language of the rule: "By the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States." With that I rest the question.

Mr. CALKINS. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], with the permission of the Chair I will say that the rule is explicit that the reduction made must be in one of three ways: First, "of the number and salary of the officers of the United States." Now, this provision of itself does not reduce the number of officers. There is no reduction by a single officer by this provision of the bill. Indirectly the result may be a reduction of the number of officers; but that is not what the Chair is to look at in determining the point of order. He is to look at the substantive provision of the bill. Does it reduce the number and salary of officers of the United States?

Secondly, the reduction must be "of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States." This provision of the bill does not purport to do that. Third, the reduction is to be "of the amounts of money covered by the bill." This provision does not do that.

So that this provision of the bill does not come under either of the three methods pointed out by the rule for the reduction of expenses. There is in the rule a provision with reference to amendments reported by a committee having charge of the general subject under consideration. I read this provision for the purpose merely of throwing light on the subject:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Now, under this provision an amendment retrenching expenditures indirectly may be reported from a committee having charge of the general subject, but the power of the Committee on Appropriations upon a bill of this kind to report amendments embracing new legislation is limited to the three methods I have pointed out, and this provision does not come within either of those methods.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that when the gentleman admits that this provision would result in the reduction of the number of officers, that fact brings the proposition within the rule. The Chair is therefore constrained to overrule the point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out the whole provision. I do not want to debate the subject now. I yield my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, if there is anything more incomprehensible to my mind than this bill it is the fact that my elegant and eloquent friend from the great State of New York [Mr. COX] should have read a speech duly and deliberately prepared in manuscript. He speaks so much better when he speaks without notes that it is absolutely an unpardonable offense toward this House for him to read a speech. So much for that.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party presented yesterday a magnificent spectacle. It put me in mind of a race-horse, who, after being entered for the race, throws up his tail, jumps over the fence, and abandons the contest. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that line of debate.

Mr. BELFORD. It was universally understood that Judge CONVERSE was to bring forward a bill touching the tariff on wool, and the Democratic party had not the courage to vote upon that question.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order, that the gentleman must confine himself to the subject under discussion as nearly as he can. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. I hope this does not come out of my time. [Renewed laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please confine himself to the question under debate.

Mr. BELFORD. I say it was universally understood yesterday that Judge CONVERSE was to bring forward under a suspension of the rules a bill affecting the tariff on wool; and the Democratic party had not the courage to consider it. You buttoned up your coats and ran like cowards. [Laughter and applause.] Is not that a fact?

You ask us to protect pig-iron in Pennsylvania, and we do it, although our votes come from the West. You ask us to protect copper in Michigan, and we do it, although our votes come from the West. You ask us to protect salt in the State of New York, and our votes to give that protection come from the West. Yet my Southern friends, who, in conjunction with the West, ought to control the councils of the nation, loan themselves to a few Democratic leaders of the North, who, in my judgment, are leading them to absolute political ruin. [Laughter and cries of "Good!" on the Republican side.] Gentlemen, your political grave in the national campaign of this year is dug, and we have contributed money to furnish the flowers to decorate it forever. [Laughter.]

What I want to see is the South standing solidly with the West and protecting the interests of both against the cormorant avarice of two States, Pennsylvania and New York. On that platform I stand and on that platform I propose to stand.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, after this flight of fancy from a member of a decaying party I want to call back the Committee of the Whole to the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment. Since this bill has been before the House I have taken some pains to give it a little consideration; and I am utterly surprised to-day to hear from such gentlemen as the gentleman from Pennsylvania the statement he has given of the naval strength of foreign powers. I hold in my hand a table, prepared for me by a distinguished officer of the Navy, entirely competent for this duty, and this statement makes a very different exhibit from that made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to say that there are only 1,900 of the line in the British navy. The statement before me gives the number as 4,798, with 58,000 seamen and 12,000 marines, making a total of 75,598, with a reserve of 24,000 men; a trained, able force, who have passed under the inspection of the admiralty. France has 73,000 officers and men, with a reserve force of 100,000. Germany has 74,000, while Spain has a reserve force of 50,000, and a total of 23,000 in actual service. Now, the gentleman knows very well the number limited by law in this country is 8,500.

But look again at the vast difference in the armament or the two countries. England has 186 unarmored vessels and she has 61 armored; but these 186 unarmored ships and 304 merchant vessels which have been built of iron and steel after the most improved pattern, are ready to-day to be equipped with breech-loading rifle guns. Germany has in all 471 guns in service, Chili 63, and Brazil 100.

Look at the comparison between those countries and our own. I shall ask leave to insert in my remarks this table in full.

Navies of other countries.

The United States Navy consists of the following vessels:

Serviceable wooden vessels	38
Serviceable monitors	13
Small tugs, for yard use	15
Wooden sailing vessels, used as training and receiving ships	13
Unfinished monitors, requiring extensive work	5
Steam vessels (wood), requiring extensive repairs	5
Torpedo ram (the Alarm)	1
Torpedo-boat	1
Total	91

Of the 38 mentioned as serviceable 1 (the Mohican) is unfinished, 1 is on the lakes, and 2 are dispatch and freight boats.

The personnel of our entire Navy is limited to 8,500 men, a large number of whom are officers.

In the above table, the number of vessels given includes only those that would be effective ships in event of war, and does not include various tugs, yachts, paddle steamers, or sailing vessels, of which each of the above nations possesses a number.

GUNS.

The guns included in the above are all rifled guns. France has no vessel in her service which is not armed with breech-loading rifles of high power and great penetration. All the other nations are provided with breech-loading rifles, and are rapidly replacing the muzzle-loaders which still remain in the service with breech-loaders. This is especially the case with England, and her gun factories are now turning out breech-loaders as fast as possible, and no new vessel is to be armed with any but high-power breech-loaders.

In the column of torpedo-boats it is difficult to ascertain the vast number possessed by foreign navies, as all nations are now buying or constructing them as rapidly as possible, but it is certain that no nation possesses a less number than that given in the table.

The naval reserves of England, France, Germany, Spain, and Italy are not merely merchant-seamen that may be drafted into the naval service in event of war, but are seamen who have actually served two or more years in the naval service.

England keeps up a paid naval reserve; in the other four nations service in the navy is compulsory, and the reserves are men who have actually passed the time required by law on board war vessels and then returned to their homes, liable to be drafted at a moment's notice into the naval service.

As to the reserve of the United States, by careful computation from census and other returns the probable number of men from which the United States would be obliged to draw its recruits in time of war is 221,000.

This apparently large reserve would be of little practical use. It includes fishermen, steamboatmen, boatmen, canalmen, engineers, pilots, and sailors. The sailmen, for they can not be called seamen, are mostly employed on vessels of our coasting trade, schooners, barges, &c., and would be of no more use on board a modern war vessel than a man who had never been to sea.

Young, active, intelligent American men could be more quickly trained to become efficient men-of-war seamen than the men who have obtained a superficial knowledge in a coasting schooner.

Again, this list includes all who pertain to the sea in any way, a large majority of whom might perhaps from physical or other reasons be unqualified for the service, and, what is of more importance, at least one-third of them are not and do not pretend to be American citizens.

Any one who cares to make a study of the subject will easily find that the reserve sailors of the United States exist only on paper, and would be of little practical use in event of war.

THE RESERVE NAVY OF FOREIGN POWERS.

By the reserve navy is meant the large fleet of iron or steel, swift merchant steamers, that will be armed and equipped as commerce-destroyers in event of war.

England in her list has nearly 300 steamers which have passed the inspection of the admiralty and for which armaments are being prepared.

The armaments and equipments of many transatlantic steamers are being stored at Halifax and the Bermudas, so in event of war a large number of swift steamers would immediately repair to those ports, arm, and proceed to sea, as an extremely valuable and dangerous auxiliary of the vessels of war.

France and almost all continental powers are proceeding in the same way, and France has in one or two instances assigned rifled breech-loading guns of 9.2 inches caliber to new merchant steamers of a speed greater than fifteen knots.

The United States has but a small reserve of this kind, and has neither the guns, nor plant for making them, with which to arm the few steamers she has.

Comparing the United States with other powers, in point of ships, guns, steamers for reserve, merchant vessels for reserve, plant for constructing ships and making guns, the defense of her coast and property—in all these we have never been in such an utterly weak, inefficient state as we are to-day.

In regard to the naval reserve of the United States, it may be urged that in the last war the volunteers and merchant sailors did their work with credit. This is undoubtedly so, but it must be remembered that that was twenty years ago. Since then the requirements of a man-of-war's seaman is much greater than it was then, owing to the rapid advance in ships, guns, and torpedoes, which every day are becoming more complicated and require special training for officers and men.

Then again we had in 1860 an immense fleet of sea-going merchant ships, which carried large crews of splendid American seamen who had spent years of their lives in deep water; to-day we have comparatively few of such vessels, and freight being so low a better class of American seamen are fast disappearing, composed of men who have never taken the oath of allegiance to this country.

The decline of our merchant fleets carries with it the decline of American seamen.

The United States has 91 ships; of these 91, 38 are wooden vessels, and totally unfit for the service. Thirteen are serviceable monitors. Five are unfinished monitors requiring expensive additions. We have some vessels of wood and 1 torpedo boat. Of the 38 mentioned as serviceable, 1, the Mohican, is finished, 1 is on the lakes, and 8 are dispatch and freight boats. The personnel of our Navy is but 8,000, and a large number are officers.

Now I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that my Democratic friends in this House, though distinguished gentlemen, as the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and New York——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HILL. I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I regret the course taken by my Democratic friends in this House, especially the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York, because I believe that this parsimonious policy on the part of any party in a great country like this is wrong. If the Democratic party of the United States ever expect to get into power they must pursue a different line of policy. Any party which is afraid to come up here and provide for the defense of 7,000 miles of the richest seacoast on the globe can never get into power in this country, and they never ought to.

I am opposed further, Mr. Chairman, to sending this money abroad to buy these ships. There is a proposition to send fifteen million of money across the ocean to pay British mechanics to build our ships, while our mechanics are idle on the streets. I am against it, sir. I will not vote for it. [Applause.]

Why, sir, the history of the last thirteen years at your world fairs, the exhibitions of Paris and London, and wherever else they have been held, has demonstrated that American skill, American genius, and American inventions have surpassed all others, and it is an insult to the intelligence of the people of this country for anybody to get up here and say we are not able here, if we desire, to construct not only our own ships, but the armament and all the projectiles and ammunition which they may need. We can, in my judgment, build just as good ships and fit them out just as well here as anywhere else on the globe. Just look at the premiums and gold medals we have taken whenever we have come into competition with other countries.

My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX], who is right on almost everything but the wool question, and who yesterday tried to pull it over the eyes of the country [laughter and applause]——

Mr. COX, of New York. We went together, my friend.

Mr. HILL. Yes, we went together in Ohio last fall when my friend and I made speeches against the reduction on wool. [Laughter and applause.] Will my friend from New York vote to restore the duty on wool? That will answer all my objections, if it is an answer in the affirmative. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman makes an assertion——

Mr. HILL. I made the assertion because I asked the gentleman yesterday to vote that way, but he said he would not do it.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman is one of my old pupils and I taught him always to be courteous and just, and I know he will be both to me.

Mr. HILL. Certainly, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. I said when we were in Ohio together in the last campaign—I took care, as my reports will show, and I always anticipate a little [laughter]—I wondered at the Republicans while cutting down the duty on wool they did not cut down the duty on the wool fabric also, as I thought there might be labor on the raw material as well as on the manufactured product; but I said the Republican party in this House nevertheless discriminated against the farmer and for the manufacturer, and my friend knows that speech will be found reported everywhere and every time just in hæc verba because I took care of my future as well as of my past, and that is what keeps me here. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman from New York a question: Whether he is ready now to place the farmers back where they were before?

Mr. COX, of New York. I am ready to cut down the tariff on woolen products as well as on the raw material.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does that help the farmer?

Mr. COX, of New York. It does justice to everybody.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] desires further time I will yield to him three minutes, as I do not care to occupy but a moment at this time.

Mr. HILL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Indiana. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from New York cut my little speech in two, as it is the first time that I have taken the floor to present my views to this House since the beginning of the session.

Now, my friend from New York—and I say it in order to correct a misapprehension into which he seems to think I have fallen—did not agree, nor did I charge that he agreed, to restore the duty on wool in our canvass in Ohio.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is the impression that would be gathered from the remarks to which I excepted.

Mr. HILL. But it is also true that he did denounce the taking of it off.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; unless the duty was also taken off the other, the products. Is not that true?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then why this outburst on the other side?

Mr. HILL. Now, Mr. Chairman, to come back to the consideration of the matter before the committee. I disagree on one point with the gentlemen who are advocating this measure. If they do not want seven cruisers in this bill I shall move to strike out the "seven" and insert in their place "ten ironclads." We have as good a right to a navy as any other country in the world, and we certainly need it worse. I am opposed to a standing army. We do not need it. We have four millions of men for our standing army now who know how to fight and are always ready. But I am in favor of a large and efficient navy to protect our seacoast. It will not do in opposition to that to say there is no need for it; that there is no war. That is no reason to assign. War may come in twenty-four hours. Nearly every war that has afflicted this world has burst upon it unexpectedly in almost every instance and for trivial causes, and we should be prepared for it when it does come.

Mr. Chairman, we may well be proud of the history of the Navy of this country. Our little Navy furnishes one of the brightest chapters in its history. Beginning with Preble and Paul Jones, we have a list made up of such names as Bainbridge, Decatur, Perry, Farragut and Porter, and a whole line of its gallant officers from the year 1800 down to now. We may well be proud of it. They have contributed their full share to shed luster and fame upon the American name and its flag. We have a good naval equipment now. But give the young men of the Navy an opportunity. Give them that opportunity which will make them proud of their country, which will make them proud of their profession, proud of the service they are employed in, and do not humiliate them by placing them on a lot of old wooden tubs and canal-boats which would have been a disgrace to the cheapest government of the Middle Ages. I am opposed to it. As an American I am ashamed of our Navy. This Congress ought to be ashamed of it; and I sincerely trust that when this bill is put upon its passage it may receive the indorsement of members of this House. I trust that our gallant young men in the naval service may be so armed that if unfortunately they should ever have to engage in a bloody conflict with some of the great naval powers of Europe they shall be enabled to report to their countrymen, in the language of the immortal Perry, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." [Applause.]

Mr. CALKINS. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield to the chairman of the committee with pleasure.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say a single word in response to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio who has just taken his seat. The gentleman from Ohio has stated that this bill is parsimonious in its character.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania entirely misunderstood me.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. That was clearly what I understood.

Mr. HILL. By no means. I say the bill is all right, but that those who are attacking the bill are parsimonious. That is what I meant to say, if I did not.

Mr. RANDALL. We have, Mr. Chairman, in no way produced any friction in the administration of the Navy by this bill. The reductions come not from striking at any doubtful places, but they come from the fact that we did not appropriate any money for the iron-clad monitors, and the difference between that and what was appropriated by the last act amounts to a reduction or difference in the two bills of $1,000,000. By the operation of the act of 1882 there was a reduction in the pay tables of some $200,000; and there is a further reduction of about $300,000 all along the line of this bill. That is all.

But I want to emphasize the statement that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] made to-day, that the amount of money expended on the Navy from the organization of this Government to 1861 was about three hundred and seventy million of dollars; and the amount expended from 1867 up to and including the appropriations of 1884 was three hundred and seventy millions more, or thereabouts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND took the floor and yielded to Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. RANDALL. So that if we have no navy at this time it is certainly not the fault of or because of any omission on the part of Congress to give the amounts of money which are required for that purpose. The fault is in the administration and the manner in which the three hundred and seventy millions of money has been expended by the executive officers of the party who occupy seats on the opposite side of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I claim, therefore, that the Committee on Appropriations has not only not been parsimonious, but that we have contributed liberally to the support of this much-honored branch of the defense of the country; that in no wise is the Committee on Appropriations open to a reasonable charge of embarrassing the Government in these particulars to any extent whatever.

Mr. REED. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania should entertain the House with talk about the amount of money that has been appropriated from the beginning of time to the present day for a navy. That is not the question before the House. He can not conceal his shortcomings by making attacks upon others; nor can he, by persisting time after time in that, succeed forever in distracting the attention of the country from his own non-action. Nobody wants to thrash again and again that old stuff, that has been discussed over and over again in this House. What is the good of it? This sort of statement has been made and answered time and time again, until people have no desire to hear any more about it. The question now is, what are you doing—not what has somebody else done or failed to do. Why does not the gentleman stand upon his proposition of the other day, that we are never going to have a war and that we do not need any navy?

Mr. RANDALL. I never said we were not going to have a war. What I said was——

Mr. REED. In the short time I have I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. But the gentleman should quote me correctly.

Mr. REED. As regards the monitors, why do they not either finish them or tear them out? If they are fit for anything, they ought to be finished. If they are not fit for anything, then they ought to be torn out.

Why, sir, we have got our great cities exposed to attack from an enemy, and everybody knows it. We have got wealth untold. We could expend money enough to furnish the few ships that are needed to defend our large coast cities. And yet gentlemen sit there idle all the time. They have got a large majority. If they do not like the way in which the Navy has been built, if they say it is owing to somebody's fault a navy has not been built, let them devise a plan for building a navy and build it. That is what we need to-day.

Is the Democratic party forever to confine itself to being a negation? Are they but an organized "no?" Why do they not take some sort of direct action and do something? The position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is intelligible unless I have misrepresented him; that is, that we are not going to have any war, that it is going to be always peace. But the other gentleman who has just sat down [Mr. HILL] has stated what is the experience of all history, namely, that wars come upon a people at once and unexpectedly.

I do not believe in a profuse expenditure for a navy, but I do believe that we ought to put ourselves in such a position that we may not have our best cities taken by a third-rate power before we can get ready to beat them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I have not said this country would never go to war. I said there was no enemy in sight. I see no enemy except the enemies of the Treasury of the United States, some of whom I now recognize before me.

Mr. BELFORD. If the enemy was in sight the Democracy would run. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. As they did yesterday.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the chief among the sinners I am referring to. [Laughter.]

I say that this bill goes to the result of building a navy. By the appropriations in this bill we complete all the cruisers now authorized by the law. We halted as to the monitors for very good reasons, which, when that subject is under discussion, I propose to give. We have already expended on these vessels, the Amphitrite, the Puritan, the Terror, and the Monadnock $3,546,941.41, and we are asked to contribute how much more to complete them?—$3,838,769.62; making the aggregate cost of these four monitors $7,385,711.03. And we are asked to contribute nearly four millions more when we are advised that these monitors are not safe for sea, and that they are more apt to be confined in their effective use to harbor defenses than to be effective for the original objects of their construction. And I say we can make the harbor defenses of this country vastly more effective by expending $3,800,000 in new improvements in the nature of harbor defenses than we can by wasting it and pouring it into the river, as it were, by expending four millions more on these monitors that may not be able to float.

We have exhibited our liberality in a marked degree. We have given the money to finish all these cruisers, notwithstanding we have been told by the chief construction office of the Navy that they will be a failure. Now, I would like to know when we are so informed whether this side of the House and the committee were not justified in withholding the appropriations that when expended were likely to fail to accomplish the purposes intended?

Mr. REED. Why then did you not break up those monitors?

Mr. RANDALL. I am sorry to introduce this gentleman's name, because ever since he differed with the Secretary of the Navy on these subjects there has been an incessant effort to daunt him out of office or else to legislate him out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I will publish with my remarks the figures as to the cost of the monitors.

The memorandum is as follows:

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. RANDALL] and gentlemen who have preceded him this morning refer to the large amount of money which has been expended upon the Navy. The charge has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], as I understand him, that that money has been squandered.

Now, from 1874 down to the Forty-seventh Congress the other side of this House had the control here. Did you bring in a bill to construct a new navy? Did you present a bill for the construction of new ships? No. You simply proceeded to make appropriations of money for the repairs of old ships and for the maintenance of the old navy-yards. Did you find any fault with the expenditures of that money? I fail to recall any instance of the kind.

You say now it is not the fault of Congress that we have no navy, and you point to the large sums of money which have been appropriated, and ask why we have not had a navy constructed and why the nation has no navy now. I will tell you. It was for the reason that you insisted that no new ships should be built unless special bills for that purpose were introduced here and passed by Congress. You gave no authority in general appropriation bills for the construction of new ships. You made appropriations for the Navy, and provided that those appropriations should be spent upon the old ships in commission or those unfit to go into commission. The fault lies at your doors that this money has been expended as it has been and that to-day we have nothing to show for it.

We have here a bill from the Senate providing for the construction of new cruisers. Why do you not consent that the provisions of that bill may be attached to this? If you desire that the money appropriated for the Navy shall be expended upon new ships, why not give us the chance to vote for a proposition of that kind? You have the power and the control here; it does not rest with us to do that.

We all understand that for the ordinary running expenses of the Navy vast sums of money must be appropriated. Is it fair and just to aggregate those sums, which are simply for the housekeeping expense of the Navy, and say that no navy has been built during the administration of the party in power, when you have denied to that administration any authority to construct new ships?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I trust that gentlemen will now be willing to vote on the pending paragraph. We have been discussing questions which will come up under other paragraphs of this bill, and properly come up then. We will then have this discussion all over again. If we go on in this way we may continue to discuss this bill for days and days. Now, unless some gentleman has a substantial amendment to propose——

Mr. CALKINS. Will my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations yield to me for a moment? I desire to discuss the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I think my colleague on the committee will agree with me that most of the debate which we have now had should properly take place upon other paragraphs of the bill.

Mr. REED. I believe that I rather hinted that this matter has been discussed before. I am glad to see the gentlemen on the other side are beginning to realize that we have this discussion over and over again.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I think we should not continue this discussion now.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the formal amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIN. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending paragraph, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:
"Provided, That this shall not operate to delay the promotion of officers who served during the late war."

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to reserve a point of order on that amendment until I can find out the effect of it.

Mr. CURTIN. It is only to allow promotions to continue in the case of officers of the Navy who served in the late war. I do not think it is right to turn those officers out of the Navy.

Mr. CALKINS. If the committee shall refuse to strike out the clause which I have moved to strike out, then the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] will be necessary. Let us first have a vote on the motion to strike out.

Mr. CURTIN. With great pleasure, provided I can offer it afterward if necessary.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly; the gentleman will have that opportunity. I want to say one word on the motion to strike out which I have submitted. I do not care to go into any discussion of the building of the monitors or of the amount of money which has been expended since 1867 upon our Navy. At the proper time in the discussion and consideration of this bill I will furnish tabulated statements showing that the amount of money expended by the two bureaus, that of construction and repair and that of engineering, has been expended in the repair of wooden ships. Some seventy millions of dollars has been expended by those two bureaus, in some cases for the repair of ships to the amount of 50 or 75 per cent. of what it would cost to construct new ships of like character. At the proper time I will discuss that question.

If I can now have the attention of the committee for a moment I want to say that every one of us on this floor is interested in the amendment which I have offered. There is nothing in it of a partisan character or that has any reference to economy. If the provision shall be stricken out of the bill, there will be just as much money carried by the bill as if the provision shall be retained. There will be just as much money appropriated for the pay of the officers of the Navy, and the only difference which this provision of the bill will make is that officers of the Navy will stand perfectly still, so far as promotion is concerned, for from seven to nine years; whereas if my amendment shall prevail there will be one promotion for each two vacancies, and the reduction in the number of officers will extend over a period of from twelve to fourteen years. That is all there is of it.

I say that every member on this floor is interested in this matter. It affects only one class of officers. It does not affect the admirals or commodores. The rank of captain is the first that it strikes. Officers of this class encounter the wall provided in this bill against promotion. They must stand perfectly still for seven years.

Why, Mr. Chairman, a naval officer lives for promotion. He has nothing else in the world to live for. He sacrifices the comforts of home and family and friends. He lives for promotion. Yet by this provision you propose to stop every young officer whom you or I have been instrumental in putting into the Navy and require him to remain stationary in one grade for seven, eight, or nine years, as variously estimated.

This is wrong. It is unjust to the very men whom we ourselves have put into the Navy to build it up. In my judgment the motion I have submitted ought to receive the vote of every man on this floor.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask the gentleman to add my amendment to his. I am in favor of his amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I prefer that a vote be taken separately on my proposition to strike out the whole clause. If that be not done, I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. If the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] should prevail, there will be no necessity for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Chairman, every argument submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] in favor of his amendment would have been a proper argument if addressed to members of this House and the Senate in 1882 when this enactment was adopted. This provision of law was then enacted because the services of these officers are not needed. If they are needed, strike out the whole provision and let promotions come to all; but if the services of these officers are not required the provision is wise. Why appeal to sentiment and sympathy to keep in the service officers who are not needed? We ought not to appropriate public money to pay officers whose services are not needed, no matter how worthy those officers may be. If they are entitled to a gratuity, put it on that ground; but do not appropriate money as compensation for service when that service is not required. This matter was duly considered by the Committee on Appropriations; and I hope the motion of the gentleman from Indiana will not prevail.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HUTCHINS and Mr. CALKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 82.

So the motion of Mr. CALKINS was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. CALKINS. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "purposes," in line 38, insert the following:
"Provided, That this shall not operate to delay the promotion of officers who served during the late war."

Mr. HUTCHINS. I believe a point of order was reserved on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the fact.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I submit that this amendment proposes to reverse a law adopted in the last Congress. It is new legislation on an appropriation bill; and certainly it is not in the line of economy.

The motive of the gentleman who submits this amendment is a very worthy one; and the provision might be very proper for consideration as a proposition by itself. But as an amendment to this bill, it increases expenditures; it proposes to enlarge the number of officers now authorized by law as provided by the last Congress. I can not see how this can be entertained as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. CURTIN. I have offered this amendment because I think the law of the last Congress on this subject ought to be changed. I have listened to the remarks of other gentlemen in this discussion, and it seems to be generally conceded that we are without a navy. But until we deliberately adopt the policy of dispensing with a navy I do not subscribe to the opinion that we should cut down and disgrace the officers. I only ask that the measure of reduction now proposed in reference to the officers of the Navy shall not prevail to prevent the regular promotion of officers who served in the late war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order withdrawn?

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I renew the point of order. I think it well taken, and it ought to be sustained. This is the easiest way of getting rid of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move to amend by inserting after the word "purposes," in line 38, the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That that part of the act approved August 5, 1882, limiting the number of graduates of the Naval Academy to be retained in the service in each year shall not apply to those classes who had completed the four years' course at the Naval Academy prior to the passage of said act; and those members of the class of 1881 who have been honorably discharged under the provisions of the aforesaid act may return to the service and take their places on the Naval Register in the same manner as if said part of such act had not been passed. That each cadet re-entering the service under the provisions of this act shall be charged with the sum of $950, it being the amount paid each of them upon their discharge; that one-third of said sum shall be deducted from the first year's pay, one-third from the second year's pay, and the remaining third from the third year's pay. And that hereafter there shall be allowed at the Naval Academy five cadets at large and one from the District of Columbia, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and a number of cadets equal to one-half of the number of Representatives in Congress from the States and Territories, or as near thereto as may be; that two adjoining Congressional districts rating numerically shall constitute a cadet district, and the Congressional district having the first vacancy shall be entitled to the first appointment, the appointment to alternate thereafter.

SEC. 2. That the odd district in States, and States having but one Congressional district, the Territories, and the District of Columbia shall be entitled to an appointment once in every twelve years, instead of six years, as now provided by law; that in case of adjoining Congressional districts comprising a cadet district having vacancies at the same time, the district being first numerically shall have the first appointment, the appointments to alternate thereafter; that in case of a vacancy, the said vacancy shall be filled from the Congressional district or Territory from which the original appointment was made.

That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the nomination and appointment of cadets to fill vacancies now existing at the Academy, or that may occur between now and the 15th day of May, A. D. 1884, or to cause the dismissal of any cadet now at the Academy except for cause.

That all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I raise the point of order that the proposed amendment changes existing law, while it increases the appropriation. Let me ask the gentleman whether it comes from any committee?

Mr. TALBOTT. It does, and I desire to discuss the point of order.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. TALBOTT. I know that, but I wish to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman from New York waives the point of order, I wish the Chair to understand that I will renew it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I have not withdrawn it, but, on the contrary, I insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say if the point of order does not cover the first clause, that I wish to be understood as reserving the point of order on that clause.

Mr. HUTCHINS. It changes existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course it does.

Mr. TALBOTT. The entire proposition is this: The act of Congress of the 5th of August, 1882, legislated out of the naval service two classes of young men who had gone into the Annapolis academy under existing law. Section 1521 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, when they were nominated and appointed to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, provided on graduation they should be assigned to duty in the naval service of the United States. Now, in violation of that contract entered into with them on the part of the Government by that act of August 5, 1882, as I have already said, these young men were legislated out of the Navy.

These two classes which are benefited by the amendment were at sea when that act was passed. They had no opportunity to resign from the service. When they came home from sea they then resigned, with the exception of a certain number necessary to fill the existing vacancies. They were, in fact, paid off and dismissed from the service.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of right and equity, they ought to have been retained in the service. Under the contract entered into with them there is not the least doubt of it.

As to the point of order I have a word to say. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] says that this amendment on its face retrenches expenditure. It does retrench expenditure, because in the second clause of the amendment it is provided there shall be hereafter at the Naval Academy but five cadets at large, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and a number only equal to one-half of the representation in Congress from the States and Territories. That reduces the number of appointments to be maintained at the Naval Academy at Annapolis from three hundred and forty-four to one hundred and seventy-two, thereby saving the Government the annual salary of $500 and mileage of each cadet, and when they are dismissed from the academy, that is, those who are not needed, the $1,000 or $950 which is paid them. My amendment, therefore, does make a reduction of expenditure of $200,000 in the course of the year, and therefore I hold the point of order is not well taken and ought not to be sustained by the Chair.

I know the Secretary of the Navy has sent to Congress a statement that if these young men were placed back in the institution or restored to the naval service it would cost the Government about 3,000,000. But how does he make his calculation? He makes it in this way: If they are to be put back into the service there will be three rear-admirals, so many commodores, so many captains, so many commanders, so many lieutenant-commanders, and so on down the list. Of course his statement is based on that computation. The law says there shall be six rear-admirals in the Navy, ten commodores, and goes on to give the rank all the way down. But the law says more, that when a vacancy exists there shall be promotion. Therefore when these young men are put back into the service only ten will be benefited by it, because vacancies have occurred to keep in all but fifteen, and the cost will be about $65,000.

A MEMBER. About thirteen.

Mr. TALBOTT. Yes, about thirteen, and the cost will be about $65,000. And in that connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call to the attention of the House a letter published in the New York Herald signed "Cadet," which was prepared in consultation with me, and which covers these points. I will not ask to have it read, as there is not time in my five minutes, but will include it in my printed remarks.

There was no objection to printing the letter; and it is as follows:

COMPLAINT OF THE NAVAL CADETS.

An answer to Secretary Chandler's letter—The question of economy considered.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1884.

The classes of naval cadets, for whose restoration to the service House bill 1408 provides, are as follows:

Class of 1881-'83, numbering 63; class of 1882-'84, numbering 28; making a total of 91.

Of the class of 1881-'83 twenty-two have been appointed to fill vacancies in the Navy. The following vacancies occurred in the six months ending January 20, 1884:

Died: Commodore William N. Jeffers, Lieut. H. L. Green, Lieut. F. W. Nabor, Lieut. Boutelle Noyes, Lieut. Albert T. Freeman, and Lieut. J. P. J. Augur.

Resigned: Lieut. George Talcott, Lieut. J. I. Yates, Lieut. J. W. Miller. Lieut. W. H. Slack, Lieut. Joel H. Barber, Ensign D. Haskell, Ensign F. B. Vinton, Ensign George E. West, Ensign Ed. Brinley, Ensign E. W. Nash, and Ensign S. J. Brown.

On retired-list: Lieutenant-Commander Gardner, Lieut. Commander J. A. Chesley, Rear-Admiral Clitz, Rear-Admiral Bryson, Rear-Admiral Crosby, Rear-Admiral Rhind, Lieutenant-Commander Woodrow, Captain Johnson, Lieutenant-Commander Black, Lieutenant Livingston, Lieutenant Whitfield, and Commander Eastman.

Dismissed: Commander Mullen.

Thus thirty vacancies have occurred in the line of the Navy during the past six months. According to existing law, one-half of these vacancies must be filled by appointments from the graduates of the Naval Academy, or there must be fifteen appointments of the class of 1882-'84 to fill the vacancies which have occurred in the line within six months. During the same period two vacancies have occurred through deaths in the Marine Corps. These vacancies must be filled from graduates of the same class. In all, seventeen vacancies have occurred within the past six months. Allowing the same rate of casualties for the remaining six months of the year, the vacancies to be filled will be as follows:

Vacancies in the line at present	15
Vacancies in the Marine Corps at present	10
Probable number of vacancies to occur in the line during remaining six months	15
Same to occur in Marine Corps	2
Total vacancies to be filled	42

There are twenty-eight members of the class of 1882-'84, but one of them is being educated abroad by the Government for a naval constructor, leaving twenty-seven available for other appointments, supposing that all of them should successfully pass both their mental and their physical examinations.

THE DISCHARGED CADETS.

There are forty-one members of the class of 1881-'83 who were honorably discharged in June last. Examining this list of forty-one, the Naval Academy register of 1883-'84 shows the following facts: Eugene Carroll and Robert P. Forshew have been honorably discharged at their own request and have waived their rights of reinstatement; H. B. Andrews, T. H. Matthews, T. E. Bunts unable to return from reason of physical disability; C. P. George and Z. B. Vance have been confirmed as second lieutenants in the Army.

In order to know exactly how many of this class would return to the service they have been corresponded with, and the following have reported themselves as established in business and unwilling to return to the service during peace: W. F. Flournoy, James D. Crenshaw, Silas H. Wright, Guy G. Rodgers, and J. W. Dresser.

Through physical disability one member of the class is still absent, and will undoubtedly fail to pass his physical examination, making in all thirteen members of the class of 1881-1883 who, for various reasons, are ineligible to return to the service.

Members of 1881 honorably discharged	41
Members of 1881 ineligible to return	13
Members of 1881 who may return to service	28

Then the members of both these classes of 1881-1883 and 1882-1884 to be retained in the service will be as follows:

Members of 1881-1883 to be returned	28
Members of 1882-1884 to be retained	27
Total number to be retained	55
Total number of vacancies (see above)	42
Total number after supplying vacancies	13

According to law these vacancies must all be filled; if not from these classes, then from others, and the only extra expense entailed on the Government will be that incidental to the paying of these extra thirteen.

ACT OF 1882.

An act approved August 5, 1882, reads as follows:

Hereafter only one-half of the vacancies in the various grades of the line of the Navy shall be filled by promotion, until such grades shall be reduced to the following numbers, namely: Rear-admirals, 6; commodores, 10; captains, 45; commanders, 85; lieutenant-commanders, 74; lieutenants, 250; masters, 75; and ensigns 75; and thereafter promotions to all vacancies must be made, but not to increase either of said grades above the number referred to.

In a letter to Hon. JOHN R. THOMAS, dated January 28, 1884, Secretary Chandler says that the average number of years spent in the grade of junior ensign is five. The highest (sea) pay of a junior ensign is $1,000 per annum. Thirteen men in this grade for five years makes a total of $65,000, which is the utmost extra expense that can possibly accrue from the retention of these two classes of 1881-1883 and 1882-1884. This amount is arrived at only by supposing all of this thirteen to remain in the service the whole five years and to be continually at sea, neither of which conditions is likely to be fulfilled, and, consequently, the extra expense to the Government will be less than $65,000, and the amount will be distributed over a period of five years.

Suppose that these five who have expressed a wish to remain out of the service should elect to return. Then the thirteen would be increased five, or there would be eighteen after supplying vacancies. At the same rate of pay as before the expense would be $90,000. But each of the thirty-three who would return to service would by the provisions of this act refund to the Government $950 which has already been paid him. There would thus be refunded to the Government $31,350, and the total extra expense would be $90,000 less $31,350, or $58,650, which will be the extra cost in case all of those physically qualified should return to service.

SECRETARY CHANDLER'S SUPERNUMERARY LIST.

Following the letter of Secretary Chandler, he says:

"In the annual report of the Department of December 1, 1883, it is urged that the reduction to the 1,562 line officers, allowed by the act of August 5, ought to be made at once, and that this can wisely be done by placing upon a supernumerary list those who for various reasons are not fitted for, nor likely to be ordered to, the command of vessels or any other important duty, and are therefore an incubus upon the naval establishment."

Evidently the Secretary thinks there are too many officers in the service, and wants the number reduced; but he does not propose to honorably discharge the surplus.

NEEDS OF THE SERVICE.

In criticising the petition of the naval cadets the Secretary remarks that they made no claim that their services were needed by the Government. This is quite true, and there are good reasons for it. We are young men, and our experience in naval affairs has been inextensive, and we feel that it would have been presumptuous in us to have suggested a naval policy; and this especially as the present Secretary and most other officials have said that we do not need more officers. We were, consequently, content to base our claim on its justice alone, and did not pretend to discuss the needs of the service. Even if the Navy does not need our services, it is herein shown that the expense of our retention will be less than $65,000, and when it is recalled that a contract has been broken and an injustice done, we submit that the question of economy might yield to the question of right.

NOT A DONATION.

Throughout the letter referred to the Secretary speaks of the Government as our "donor," and of the "donation" made us. We were undoubtedly handsomely educated at Government expense. We ought to be and are sincerely appreciative and grateful, and should it ever be necessary for us practically to show our gratitude we hope and believe that we would not be found wanting. But at the same time we do not see that the remuneration which the Government has bestowed on us is a donation. With due deference we would suggest that we did not go to the academy as a charitable institution. We chose it as an honorable calling, believing that we would be honored rather than condemned.

And, while we performed our part of the contract, the compensation which we received was a just salary, and not a donation.

Our assertion that there is an obligation on the part of the Government to retain us in its service is not unfounded, and is based—first, on the fact that we signed articles agreeing to serve the Government eight years, and thus became parties to a contract; second, on section 1521 Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

"When cadet-midshipmen shall have pasesd successfully the graduating examination at the academy they shall receive appointments as midshipmen, and shall take rank according to the order of the merit at date of graduation."

And we believe that these sufficiently show that our claim is not unfounded.

FITTED FOR CIVIL LIFE.

Regarding the statement that our education admirably fits us for civil life, we respectfully refer to our graduating examinations. After a six years' course we were examined in the following subjects:

Practical navigation, compass deviation, theory and practice of gunnery, French, Spanish, seamanship and naval tactics, and practical instruction in steam-engineering. And we do not think that this examination is in subjects likely to be of much assistance in civil life.

The Secretary says that some of the cadets have been proceeding on the idea that if they can barely escape dismissal for deficiencies in their studies they can still receive life commissions in the Government service. This statement is without foundation or support. The standard of scholarship is supposed to be so graded that any cadet who is graduated is competent to perform the duties of an officer. The Secretary can at any time change this standard, and if improperly qualified men have been allowed to graduate and have been given life commissions in the Government service, it has been done through the neglect of the Department. All the members of a class can not be at its head, and vituperation can not nullify the fact that many of our best officers have been those who have stood low in their classes, nor detract from the respect due those who, after honorable competition, have been unfortunate enough to be behind the headmost.

CADET.

To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD.

Mr. TALBOTT. On the point of order I say whether these young men are in the service or not, every appropriation bill coming to this House from the Committee on Appropriations will embrace provisions for the payment of the Admirals, rear-admirals, commodores, and so on down the list of officers. I take it that the Secretary of the Navy when he sent his statement did not take into consideration the intelligence of this Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman is also subject to the further point of order——

Mr. TALBOTT. I make the point that the gentleman can not make any other point of order against the amendment. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I reserved all points of order. The point of order that I now make is that there are two bills pending in the Naval Committee on the same subject.

Mr. TALBOTT. I hold that it is too late now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Chair is of opinion that the first point of order made, that this amendment proposes new legislation, is well taken, and must rule the amendment out in its present form. The Chair will state, however, to the gentleman from Maryland that if he saw fit to divide the amendment the last clause of it would perhaps be a proper one, under the rules, as far as the present point of order is concerned.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then I propose to divide the amendment and offer the last clause, that portion which relates to limiting the number of cadets. I wish, however, to state that I reserve the right to appeal from the decision of the Chair on both points.

Mr. THOMAS. I make the point of order upon the new amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland that it is the substance of a bill which is now pending before the House.

Mr. TALBOTT. And I hold that no additional point of order can be made after the discussion. The only point of order that could be entertained by the Chair is that made by the gentleman from New York, that the amendment on its face did not retrench public expenditures. The other point of order comes too late, because the subject has been discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order does not come too late, especially in view of the fact that the amendment in its present form is practically a new one. If it be a fact that there is mother bill of a similar character pending, the Chair will hold that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. TALBOTT. I do not desire to take any advantage of the House. I did introduce a bill for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will hold that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. TALBOTT. I reserve the right to appeal from the decision of the Chair in both rulings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. CALKINS. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President of the United States is hereby directed, on the 1st day of July, 1884, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to reduce the staff corps of the Navy on the active-list as follows: medical directors from fourteen to five, medical inspectors from fifteen to five, pay directors from thirteen to five, pay inspectors from twelve to five, chief engineers from sixty-nine to fifty, by selecting from the said grades such of the officers as can best be spared from the service, and placing them on the retired-list with the rank they shall respectively hold at the time of retirement: Provided, That the highest relative rank of chief engineer shall be lieutenant-commander.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understood the reading of the amendment, it provided that the medical directors should be reduced from fourteen to five. That should be corrected to read from fifteen to five.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, that is proper; that should be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a further suggestion I wish to make to the gentleman, so that his amendment will conform to what I understand to be the recommendation of the Naval Committee, and that is in reference to the pay inspectors. It should read from thirteen to five, instead of from twelve to five; and of the chief engineers from seventy to fifty, instead of from sixty-nine to fifty.

Mr. CALKINS. That is proper; the amendment should be so corrected.

Mr. RANDALL. And I would also suggest to the gentleman another correction. After the word "retirement" in the amendment this clause should be inserted:

And after the number of officers in the said grades shall be reduced as above provided the number in each grade shall not exceed the reduced number which is fixed by the provisions of this paragraph for the several grades.

Mr. CALKINS. I accept that.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the gentleman should offer that as a substitute instead of the amendment he has offered, since the first is not complete.

Mr. CALKINS. I accept that.

Mr. TALBOTT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the amendment be read as it will stand with this modification.

Mr. CALKINS. It had better be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President of the United States is hereby directed, on the 1st of July, 1884, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to reduce the staff corps of the Navy on the active-list as follows: Medical directors, from fifteen to five; medical inspectors, from fifteen to five; pay directors, from thirteen to five; pay inspectors, from thirteen to five; chief engineers, from seventy to fifty, by selecting from the said grades such of the officers as can best be spared from the service, and placing them on the retired-list with the rank they shall respectively hold at the time of retirement; and after the number of officers in the said grades shall be reduced as above provided, the number in each grade shall not exceed the reduced number which is fixed by the provisions of this paragraph for the several grades: Provided, That the highest relative rank of chief engineer shall be lieutenant-commander.

Mr. RANDALL. That I understand to be the amendment the gentleman from Indiana desired to offer. That is the way the subcommittee, I may say, desired to have it.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly. That is the proper amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Are the places of these officers, proposed to be retired, to be filled by promotions?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I am in favor of it.

Mr. TALBOTT. I now make the point of order against that amendment that it is a change of existing law and does not retrench expenditures. A reference to the pay-tables of the Navy will show that these officers when on shore or sea duty are to receive certain specified sums; and this amendment does not retrench that sum in any degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment would reduce the number of officers; and the retired-list pay being less than full pay, it is also a reduction of expenditures. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Indiana offers the amendment; I have merely suggested the alterations, as I understood the wrong amendment to have been read from the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is the pending amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to amend by adding what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the number of captains shall be reduced to thirty and the number of commanders be reduced to fifty; and no more promotions shall be made to these grades until the numbers are reduced below the number herein mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman from Tennessee desire that his amendment shall come in?

Mr. McMILLIN. At the close of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana which has just been adopted.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. It carries out further the idea embraced in the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the part of the section to which it is offered. In the second place, I make the point that the number of officers has already been fixed. The committee has fixed them and has appropriated for them, and in that view the amendment as offered now is not germane to this part of the section. In the third place, I make the suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no provision made in his amendment what shall be done with these officers.

Mr. McMILLIN. There will be no difficulty about taking care of them. So far as regards the statement of the gentleman that the bill fixes what number should be appropriated for, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana himself changed what was fixed by the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. It is fixed by general law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has proceeded on the idea that the whole clause was subject to amendment. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us understand the effect of the amendment. Does it change the law of 1882 ?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. By a further reduction of the numbers in those grades?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better not enter upon that.

Mr. McMILLIN. The trouble with the Navy, as confessed by all, is its top-heaviness. My amendment is in the direction of remedying that.

Mr. KASSON. I do not know that it will be of any use for a man to stand in his place on this floor and attempt to prevent the destructive tendencies of the majority of this House touching the Navy of the United States. If there is to be a well-considered effort by the majority to render the Navy of our country absolutely ineffective, to make it still more the laughing-stock of the people of the United States and of the civilized world, then with this destructive purpose they may as well go ahead to remove not only the semi-civil officers of the Navy, but the men who have been trained to take care of the honor of the country in its time of danger.

I have never been more astonished than to find men, especially upon this side of the House, and some upon the other side, proceeding with this work of disorganization and disintegration of this great branch of the Government service. I remember, sir, when Daniel Webster stood in his place and said to Congress, "We have a commerce that leaves no sea unexplored, and a Navy that takes no law from superior force." Now, in place of this proud boast of a once patriotic Congress, instead of giving us ships to maintain the dignity and honor of the country, instead even of maintaining the force that is trained to take the command of the ships when we shall create them, you are proceeding to deny us the ships and to banish from the service the men whose lives have been given to a proper training for protecting the honor of the country in its hour of peril.

What a contrast to the spirit that animated us in the old times ! Yes, what a contrast to the spirit that animated the former Democracy of the country, when they unanimously stood by the honor, the dignity, and, I may add, the glory of the United States upon the seas. Sir, I regret most profoundly, and I feel with a sense of humiliation, that I am speaking to men who will not look at the Navy of the United States with eyes of friendship nor in the light of the demands of the future.

Our fisheries treaty expires next year, and there are impending before us difficulties which will certainly arise before that question can be settled; and yet you are banishing from your Navy the men who can serve us on such occasions. I remember that we have a continual state of agitation with a foreign power in respect to the alleged interference of our foreign-born citizens with the internal condition of that foreign country. And you are giving your diplomacy no power to defend the rights of this country. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY], and I thank him here in my place for his splendid effort the other day to support our Government with an indispensable naval force, has called your attention to that question. Our commercial treaties are violated by half of the countries of Europe to-day. If you expect your diplomacy to sustain our interests, give it the power to strike as well as it has the power to speak. Words alone are feeble instruments for the maintenance of national rights.

Sir, there is not a Government in Europe which does not know to-day that you have no power to defend your rights if they are assailed. They may violate every treaty; they may refuse to receive every article we export; they may silently destroy our trade; and you are proposing here by your action on this bill to tell them that you will not give your executive government the necessary power. The Secretary who has charge of our foreign affairs is to-day in a condition of humiliation, and he must remain in that condition until you give a weapon into his hand to strengthen the verbal arguments which he employs with foreign countries. They know we can do nothing but talk; and all attempts to use vigorous words to foreign countries without the power to back them up with force is simply to place us in the attitude of a helpless bully who will be condemned and despised by his adversaries. And yet, sir, under the plea of economy, you are assailing the dignity and the very power of your country to maintain its position among the nations of the earth.

Mr. RANDALL. In view of the usual fairness of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I must confess that I am somewhat surprised at what I regard as the unjust criticism he has just made in so far as this side of the House is concerned. The Committee on Appropriations have not recommended any assaults upon the personnel of the Navy, save and except to give force and effect to the law of 1882, which that side of the House enacted. The amendment of which the gentleman complains so much did not emanate from the Committee on Appropriations at all; it came from a distinguished member of his own side.

Mr. CALKINS. I beg leave to say to the gentleman that it came from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. If I am not accurate in that statement——

Mr. TALBOTT. Permit me to say that I claimed the right as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, without going any further than my own action, to oppose this proposed legislation both as regards the line, staff, and engineer corps.

Mr. RANDALL. Never mind about that.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to finish what I have to say. The Committee on Naval Affairs did send a communication to the Committee on Appropriations, and it came back to us. We did not act upon it, but left it without being acted upon by either committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the case is stronger than I stated it, if the amendment came from the Committee on Naval Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations; for notwithstanding the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House made that recommendation, the Committee on Appropriations hesitated to adopt it. Therefore the criticism of the gentleman from Iown [Mr. KASSON] does not apply fairly to either the majority of the Committee on Appropriations or the majority upon this side of the House.

And now while on my feet I want to say that I did not understand the amendment. I did not know that it struck at the engineer as well as the other corps. I should like to modify it in that particular.

Mr. REED. Then vote it all down; that will be satisfactory.

Mr. RANDALL. The difficulty is that it has been adopted on a motion from the other side of the House.

Mr. REED. We can vote it down in the House.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. MORSE took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 452) to remit the forfeiture of the British bark Viscount Canning, and to refund the proceeds of the sale thereof to her owners, Edward D. Morris and C. R. Morris:

A bill (S. 1369) to prevent and punish counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments; and

A bill (S. 1705) to provide for the issue of duplicate checks.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a resolution for the printing of the report of the National Academy of Sciences, with its appendices.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and proceeded with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I must protest against the disposition attributed not only to me but to all on our side of the House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] who has addressed the committee in opposition to the amendment. There is no man who takes more pride in whatever there is to be proud of in connection with our Navy than I do.

In anything I may do or say here it is not my purpose to detract in the least from the prestige of the Navy or to diminish its efficiency. I would increase its efficiency; and in order to do that, as a first step, I would do away with the officers who are not essential to its efficiency. The gentleman has said that there is not a nation in Europe that is not well posted as to the condition of our Navy. Who cares if they are well posted? The proud boast of every American citizen is that there is not a power upon which the sun shines strong enough or arrogant enough to attack one American citizen upon the high seas, even if he had nothing but two logs pinned together and the American flag over him.

Mr. TALBOTT (in his seat). How about the Virginius?

Mr. McMILLIN. As I said, I do not propose to diminish the efficiency of the Navy. By this remark I do not intend to indicate any desire for inaction or what we should do in future. I sympathize with the efforts made on this side of the House to delay the construction of vessels when it is doubted whether, if constructed, they will float. Some have been put upon the dock and there rotted before completion. Others have been put there and completed when it was a problem, upon which engineers were almost equally divided, whether they would float when placed in the water.

If this amendment is not right the House can vote it down. But I do think that something of the top-heaviness of our Navy ought to be got rid of, and it was with the view of that only I offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out a word. I am glad that we have had a statement from the gentleman who last spoke as to his ideas of a proper navy for the United States. I do not charge that conception upon all gentlemen on the other side of the House. I am glad to know, however, that we have here a distinct proposition to combat. All that the United States needs in time of difficulty is a couple of logs fastened together, floating upon the ocean, with an American upon them and a flag over his head!

Mr. MCMILLIN. I neither said that, nor could the gentleman have so understood me.

Mr. KASSON. What was said seems to be appreciated on both sides of the House; the RECORD will show it, and I hope it will not be corrected.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am not guilty of that which would justify any such insinuation.

Mr. KASSON. We find then, Mr. Chairman, it is to be enough that we have the glamour of the American name and flag in order to maintain our rights upon the high seas. Every man who knows anything of the late history of the world knows that to-day the serious question of means to preserve peace as well as to make war is a question of blood and iron—Blut und Eisen. Chain your logs together and set your raft afloat on the high seas; let the captain of that famous craft be arrested or captured by a foreign ship 3,000 miles away, and then seek your remedy by diplomacy alone if you wish. If that is Democracy, let the people of the country know it.

Mr. Chairman, there is no profounder mistake prevalent on this floor to-day than that which comes too often from my friends on the other side of the House. I mean the assumption that the country is interested in nothing but the saving of the money now in the Treasury. The question which concerns the people is that this money shall be spent wisely for a good and a national purpose. If you spend it for such a purpose and get your money's worth, the people are as sure to crown the work with their approval as they are to believe, like patriots, in maintaining the honor and the glory of the country.

I protest, therefore, that it is neither in the interest of the people nor in accordance with their wishes that you should aim your parsimonious blows at the only means we have to protect our commerce upon the ocean and the rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries. It is known to-day to all the world that without an effective navy it is simply impossible to maintain your rights against foreign aggression or procure satisfaction for the wrongs which spring up repeatedly and unexpectedly in foreign ports in cases involving the rights of American citizens

For this reason I repeat that gentlemen commit a profound mistake in making assaults upon the Navy, destroying its esprit de corps, and endangering its usefulness. You may strike off a man here and a man there, saving a few hundred or a few thousand dollars; but when a moment comes, as it did a few years ago, where you are upon the verge of war, you find it necessary to make a sudden expenditure of $4,000,000 to put old, incompetent ships in a condition to make a show of warfare to protect the rights of our citizens abroad.

Why, sir, to-day in the navy of one foreign country the whole preparation for war is made, and it is a country with which our relations are assuming a disagreeable condition. I will not name it; but gentlemen will understand the allusion. That country has its stores provided for each ship, its officers and men assigned, and everything so arranged that in eight days every ship of a squadron can be put upon the sea to assail the commerce of any country against which that nation has a complaint. We are destroying our Navy, while other nations are building up theirs with all the treasure under their control and with all the spirit of patriotic honor.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in his speech just preceding the last gave us to understand that time and again this country was being insulted by foreign governments and constantly met by a refusal to observe treaty obligations. He pictured us among the nations of the earth as subjected time and again to affronts that the executive department would have resented by war if we had had any navy that the Government could use. Now, I have been for ten years a member of this House, and there are around me gentlemen who, whether they have been here or not, have kept themselves informed as to current events. Why have these numerous indignities been concealed? There have been discussions on the naval bill year after year, but never until now have we learned of the infamous and degrading attitude of the Government of the United States among the nations of the earth.

During General Grant's administration there was for several years more than $100,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, under his absolute control, which might have been used to build naval vessels. In 1868 $65,000,000 were covered into the Treasury after reserving $50,000,000 to carry on the Government. How does it happen that our Navy has been so belittled and this country so degraded and insulted? Why has our Navy so suddenly disappeared? One reason has been administrative mismanagement. We had a number of ironclads left over from the war. Congress decided by resolution to provide for their sale. There was an attempt to sell a part of them. The Secretary of the Navy declared they were utterly useless, and that for this reason there ought not to be any money spent in keeping them in repair. Yet in two years millions of dollars were spent on those old ironclads, which were unfit to be placed upon the water except under convoy.

I wish now to go back to the period when the Democratic party came into power in this House. Let us see whether there was not some public reason, the force of which was indorsed by the American people, for the course of the Democratic party. We came into power in the midst of a great financial crisis. Industry after industry was toppling. Thousands of men engaged in every branch of business were on the verge of bankruptcy. The cry of "economy" came from all over the land. It was responded to by this House; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KANDALL] has no laurel that he should prize more highly than the reduction in public expenditures that was then made. Yet, sir, we were continually charged with extravagance, notwithstanding we had largely reduced expenditures. Mr. SHERMAN went before the country and charged that the Democratic party had been guilty of extravagance.

Mr. MCMILLIN obtained the floor, and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. This condition of things went on until 1879, and during a portion of that time so low were the revenues of the Government that one year we did not even pay the amount that was due to the sinking fund. Was this any time to talk about building up a navy? Nay, sir; the great body of men on the other side of the House had to be silent in the face of the condition of the country. It was under circumstances like these, when we had no money, when it was a question whether or not we should not increase rather than reduce the burdens upon the people, and we preferred in such a crisis to withhold as far as we possibly could the heavy hand of taxation from the people which would be rendered necessary by larger appropriations from the public Treasury.

Now, sir, I deny that the American people need a navy to compare with that of England or an army to equal that of foreign powers. And such has never been the sentiment of this country, and no party has ever dared to act on any such basis in making appropriations for either our Army or Navy. We are isolated, and we have none of the jealousies which menace those foreign governments. We happily are free from that constant apprehension which makes them sleepless for fear by some sudden and rapid movement the life of the nation itself may disappear. We have none of the troubles which surround them, and no need of the vast navies and immense armies they keep up. And, for one, I subscribe to the opinion of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], though perhaps I will not repeat his illustration, as its meaning has been perverted; but, sir, I do subscribe to the doctrine that our people, with their immense wealth, with their population, with their intelligence, with their high civilization, constitute a power that would make it reckless for any foreign nation to rush precipitately into a contest with us.

But it is not going to happen. I do not believe, sir, if it be threatened, we are going speedily to be precipitated into war. Negotiations and diplomacy have saved us very much. They have saved us from many issues which threatened trouble since the close of the war. And unless there is some reason like that which exists with the nations of Europe for keeping up great armanents, I do not think we are justified in assuming the responsibility of making such large appropriations as gentlemen advocate on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CANNON. I hope I will be heard.

Mr. KASSON. I will withdraw the amendment and renew it, and then yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. What amendment is it that is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. That of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. CANNON. I ask it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the number of captains shall be reduced to thirty, the number of commanders to fifty, and no more promotions shall be made to these grades until the numbers are reduced below the number herein mentioned.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party in 1874 came into power in the House of Representatives, and for six years it held the control of the purse-strings of the national Treasury. A portion of that time it also had a majority in the Senate of the United States. In round figures, in all that six years Congress appropriated for the Navy $100,000,000, and when those six years had expired the Navy was in infinitely worse condition than when they had begun. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] says that for four years of that time the country felt the hardships of hard times. Well, grant it to be so, and yet for two years succeeding 1879 the country had never experienced greater prosperity. Still you did nothing toward building up the Navy.

But during the succeeding year, in the Forty-seventh Congress, the Republican party came into power in this House with a bare majority. We had to have our people here at all times, so bare was the majority, in order to hold control of the House. On some occasions we were in great tribulation to get and keep a quorum. The Navy was top-heavy, without ships, without efficiency, and we undertook to cut down the personnel of the Navy, to circumscribe it, to stop promotions, the several grades gradually growing smaller without doing injustice to any, so that only the requisite number of officers would be retained, and the money saved by doing away with and getting rid of superfluous officers could be put into the construction of ships, and thus enable the officers of the Navy who were retained to sail out upon the high seas and look after the protection of our commercial interests. [Applause.]

Under that legislation, Mr. Chairman, brought about by the Republican party, we have now approaching completion four cruisers. But what do we see in this House? Under Democratic rule, not in hard times, I will tell the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], but with the Treasury full and overflowing, with a clamor on all sides to know what can be done for the purpose of keeping down the surplus in the Treasury; with plenty of money, with reasonably good times, with the example of economy and efficiency in dealing with the Navy which the preceding Republican Congress had given you, yet you come in now with a navy appropriation bill which does not provide, although, as I have said, these four new steel cruisers are nearing completion, the appropriation for their proper armament, which will be required next summer or fall.

Do you gentlemen on the other side propose to follow the example we set you of building up the Navy by the construction of additional cruisers? No; but far from it—you withhold equipment from those which we have already provided. And yet gentlemen say they are friends of the Navy. Now, the true course is to take the middle ground. Give us a small number of the very best ships we can get, whether they be steel cruisers or otherwise. We have provided for four of the very best ships which can be built. Let us test the policy we have begun, and which so far has proved successful. By pursuing still further the legislation initiated in 1882 of weeding out all that was superfluous in the Navy, we will, in my judgment, in a short time accomplish the thing so necessary for the honor and protection of this country—the establishment of a navy capable and efficient for whatever work may be required of it. [Applause.]

And we will then cease spending $16,000,000 a year merely that we may keep house and have nothing in it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCADOO. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a single question before he takes his seat?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe in adhering to what I understand has been the historic policy of this country, and that is the maintenance of a Navy small in numbers but of the best quality. That policy has not only been found sufficient in the past for the protection of the national interests, but it has also succeeded in working out in a most extraordinary degree our national glory and distinction. I am glad that the Committee on Appropriations have provided for the completion of the new cruisers which were ordered by the last Congress.

As one of the citizens of the United States I took an interest in the action of Congress in that regard, and I am free to say that I was greatly disturbed during the summer by adverse criticisms which were made upon the new vessels, which criticisms appeared in the English authority best known and of the highest repute upon such subjects. I refer to two articles in the Engineer, which criticised the specifications upon which these cruisers were to be constructed, and setting forth a ground of criticism which seemed to be of the gravest character. Soon after I came to Washington I embraced the opportunity I had here to make inquiry and ascertain to what extent these criticisms were justified by the facts. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to be able to say that they were based not upon the specifications upon which the ships were being actually built, but upon specifications which were laid before the advisory board and rejected, and that the real specifications upon which the ships are being constructed are of an entirely different character from those which were criticised by the Engineer. I also took occasion to make such examination as a non-expert might make into the question as to whether these vessels are likely to be useful or not, and I am satisfied that they are certain to be highly valuable ships, useful for all of our purposes as cruisers, and to the extent for which they are fitted for the more serious service of war will be most formidable vessels.

And in this connection, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the only criticism that I have to make upon the action of the Committee on Appropriations in framing this bill. I can not understand why a ship of war is to be built and not provided with guns. The only purpose of a ship of war is to place the guns on the scene of contest; and what object the committee could have had in not making proper appropriations for the armament of these vessels intended to be ships of war I fail to comprehend. My colleague [Mr. HUTCHINS], who has charge of the bill, stated this morning that he thought it worth while not to make the appropriation of $400,000 required for the armament of these vessels until the fact was ascertained with certainty that the vessels themselves would be successful. Is it true, Mr. Chairman, that the committee are under such misapprehension, that they are in such doubt as to whether these vessels will be successful, that it is necessary to save the money needed to arm them until we know that fact beyond question?

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment, as I think he misapprehends what I stated? I said that we had appropriated, or that there was appropriated now for ordnance which might be applied to the armament of these cruisers, $584,000.

Mr. REED. How much of that has been expended?

Mr. CALKINS. Every dollar.

Mr. HUTCHINS. A very small portion of it, as I understand.

Mr. REED. Almost all of it has been expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield some time to my friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], whose time has been consumed by other gentlemen; but I want to say in this connection that every cent of the money that was allowed or allotted for the construction of ordnance under last year's appropriation bill has either been expended or contracted to be expended, and will be before this year is closed. That is the exact fact, as the Secretary of the Navy informed me himself.

Mr. COX, of New York. And no guns?

Mr. CALKINS. Some are in process of construction, but there will not be half enough, no, not a quarter enough, of money to arm the four vessels now being built, and it requires this $447,000 estimated for to construct the armament for the four steel cruisers.

Now I want to say a word as to the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in reference to me, which I do not think he intended to be personal in its application:

Mr. RANDALL. Before the gentleman from Indiana proceeds, as I do not know what language he attributes to me as having applied to him, I would like to be informed what it is.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania undertook to say that the criticism of the gentleman from Iowa, when he was addressing the committee, was applicable to me because I offered the amendment which came to our committee from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa was upbraiding this side of the House for an assault, as he claimed, on the personnel of the Navy.

Mr. CALKINS. And the amendment to which the gentleman from Iowa was referring was the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and not the amendment which had been passed by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. It was in very general terms, and comprehensive.

Mr. CALKINS. Be that as it may, I never yet in this House or in any other place have shrunk from what I believe to be a duty. I believed that the best plan for the Navy, for its honor and glory, to put it on the footing we all want to see it, was to get rid of some of the officers of the staff now on land performing no duty, and who can perform no duty because they have too much rank. As my friend from Illinois said the other day, they would have to run a lighter alongside to relieve them of part of that rank. Every day we hear attacks on the Navy; and when we attempt to do something that will be just to these officers and to put them on the retired-list, where they will all have to go some time, attacks, I think unjust, are made on the Appropriations Committee.

As to the line, I agree with the gentleman from Iowa. We have not got enough line officers. I showed in my speech the other day that we have not as many as we had in 1842. It is the line officers in the Navy that command our ships that maintain the flag of our country wherever the sails of commerce whiten the seas. It is the line officers that I believe this Congress should provide for and provide liberally for. In times of peace we can get along with comparatively few staff officers. In times of war their places can be again filled up. But it is the line officers this House, in my judgment, should protect. Hence, the attack made by the gentleman from Tennessee on the line seemed to me entirely unjust and one which ought not for a moment to be considered by this House.

I regret I could not yield my whole time to my friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], but I wanted to make these observations to set myself right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has one minute and a half of his time remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana I am incapable of unnecessarily offending anybody. I am quite sure he does not suppose I meant to offend him. When I want to offend anybody I will do it somewhere else than here.

Mr. CALKINS. I know very well the gentleman from Pennsylvania is incapable of doing anything of the kind for the purpose of hurting my feelings. But when he intimated that I was responsible for an amendment, I wanted to set him right.

Mr. RANDALL. The criticism was general.

Mr. COX, of New York. But the amendment did come from the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Will it be in order for me, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be in order now.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I will reserve what I have to say until another opportunity.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to renew the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a single moment to give a statement as to the excess of revenues over expenditures for a single year?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I quote from a document furnished by the Treasury Department showing the amounts of estimated revenues and expenditures of the United States in each year from 1863 to 1884 inclusive. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the Forty-sixth Congress found a large surplus of money out of which they might have enlarged the Navy. I find that during the year 1879 the excess of revenue over the expenditures was $6,879,000; and not until several months had elapsed after the expiration of that Congress did there appear to be any great excess. After that Congress expired there appeared in 1880 to be sixty-five millions of excess for the first time and no one had any guarantee of the permanency of that large excess.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] to yield to me.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I do not yield further. I move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to limit debate.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill all debate on the first paragraph of the bill, concluding with line 38, and all amendments thereto, be limited to fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUTCHINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

DISTRICT INDUSTRIAL HOME SCHOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate, under the eighth rule, Order of Business 134.

Mr. CONGER. Would it be in order at this time to move to take from the Calendar for its passage a bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. CONGER. I move, then, that Senate bill No. 1519, reported yesterday by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], be taken up.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read by its title for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1519) to regulate the powers and duties of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I made the motion when the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. INGALLS] was not here, because I am very anxious to have the bill considered to-day. He would have made it probably if I had not. I ask that the bill may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan to now proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I should like to know what special reasons there are, if any, for taking the bill up out of its order.

Mr. CONGER. I think if the bill can be read the Senator will see a reason for it or I can explain it very readily myself.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I prefer to know the reasons before I am called on to vote on the question of taking it up.

Mr. CONGER. The bill is to give power to the Industrial Home School of this District to receive by an instrument in writing from parents children that they propose to take and educate, waifs that they pick up, as they have heretofore done. It provides for some instrument in writing by which the parents may assign to them the control of the children. The necessity for the measure is that children are taken by this institution, clothed and educated for a particular time, and then the freak of the guardian or parent takes them away and puts them again upon the streets exposed to vice. There are several cases of that kind which have occurred lately, and in order that this bill may go to the other House and have consideration there it is very desirable to pass it at once. The Industrial Home School is one which Congress for some years has given an appropriation to aid, and to that extent it is a public institution. I think the reading of the bill will show the propriety of it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Michigan that in line 4 of the first section there is evidently a misprint. It reads "an instrument of writing;" the Chair thinks it should read "in writing."

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that clerical error will be corrected.

Mr. HOAR. I heard the bill read imperfectly. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan if the bill provides for the care of any property the wards may happen to have.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir, not at all. It provides that either by the courts or by an instrument in writing duly acknowledged children may be delivered to the custody of the trustees of the Industrial Home School for such length of time as the parent or guardian in writing may agree.

The trouble about it heretofore has been that little waifs are taken up, saved from vice and exposure to vice and crime, and taken to this institution, and clothed and educated for a particular length of time, and just at the time when their education is the best perhaps their parents or guardians remove them from it. The trustees have no power to keep them in the institution.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator does not propose to have the corporation intrusted with the guardianship of the property of wards. Would it not be well to limit the second section by inserting after the word "guardianship," in the sixth line, the words "so far as relates to the person of such wards?"

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that amendment. There is none of this class ever known to have property. It is because they are utterly helpless that they are provided for.

Mr. HOAR. Still the first section authorizes any parent or guardian to surrender the custody of an infant to the board of trustees. The next section provides that the corporation may be appointed guardian. There is no limit as to waifs or children without property.

Mr. CONGER. Say "guardian of the person."

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend in the sixth line of the second section by inserting after "guardianship" the words "so far as relates to the person of such ward."

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, in section 2, after the word "guardianship," it is proposed to insert "so far as relates to the person of such ward;" so as to read:

And the said corporation may take and exercise said guardianship so far as relates to the person of such ward to the same extent and under the same obligations and conditions as is now provided by law in the case of natural persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate Order of Business 134 under Rule VIII, being the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia. The bill has been already read, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD].

Mr. VEST. I should like to inquire what has become of the bill providing for the government of the Yellowstone Park. I understood that that was to come up in advance of this bill.

Mr. GARLAND. That comes under the ninth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Yellowstone Park bill stands next. The bill now under consideration went over, the Chair understands, to stand at the head of the Calendar this morning.

Mr. HARRIS. By unanimous consent the bill that the Chair has just laid before the Senate was passed over informally to come up this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill that the Senator from Missouri refers to was taken up afterward and was being proceeded with when I chanced to leave the chair yesterday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, yesterday there was a very short discussion limited by the rule we then were under, and I presented this amendment as one appealing strongly to the favor of every thoughtful man. There is a class of females referred to in the amendment who are not yet criminals, but who are on the border line of criminality, when any measure that can arrest their downward course is one of great importance, and certainly should be taken if lawfully we may take it.

The objection was raised yesterday that the amendment was an invasion of personal liberty, that it permitted imprisonment without prior condemnation, to prolonged punishment not measured by law; but I think the gentlemen who made that objection have not considered the condition of existing law or the practical fact of that discretionary police power which must be deposited somewhere in every well-regulated community for the purpose of arresting the perpetration of crime, not simply to punish it when committed, but to anticipate and prevent its accomplishment.

When this matter was brought before me by some ladies, residents of this District, warmly interested in the charities of the District and in the amelioration of the condition of the more helpless classes, I found a legislative precedent, and the amendment was drawn chiefly in imitation of an act of the District Legislature to establish an industrial home for women and children, passed on the 26th of June, 1873. That act created an establishment called the Industrial Home for Women and Children, described its purposes, and the third purpose stated was in these words:

A reform school for girls and women, where any incorrigible, corrupt girl or woman of known evil repute and life, who, after the opening of the industrial home, refuses to avail herself of the opportunity for reformation, and refuses employment, and is found soliciting vice upon the street or elsewhere or voluntarily residing in a house of prostitution, may be sent under arrest and may be required to labor at some suitable employment, and to receive instructions and practical training in English branches and industrial pursuits, and may be required to remain until the board of trustees shall deem reformation complete.

This is a legislative precedent which has been acted upon in this District and has been found to be fruitful of beneficial results. This was the precedent. It was from the language of this act that the amendment was drawn, and which I thought I had submitted to the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] who is at the head of the District Committee, and which I had the impression received his approval individually. Besides, there was an act of Congress passed on the 6th of May, 1870, and which provides with respect to boys under the age of 16, whose constitutional rights are just as carefully to be guarded as those of a greater age, and who in fact from their tender years are more particularly entitled to thoughtful protection.

The law to which I refer provides:

Any boys under the age of sixteen years who shall or may be liable to punishment by imprisonment under any existing law of the District of Columbia, or any law that may be enacted and in force in said District. Second. Any boy under sixteen years of age, with the consent of his parent or guardian, against whom any charge of committing any crime or misdemeanor shall have been made, the punishment of which, on conviction, would be confinement in jail or prison. Third. Any boy under sixteen years of age who is destitute of a suitable home and adequate means of obtaining an honest living, or who is in danger of being brought up, or is brought up, to lead an idle and vicious life. Fourth. Any boy under sixteen years of age who is incorrigible or habitually disregards the commands of his parents, father or mother, or guardian; or who resorts to immoral places or practices; or who neglects or refuses at the request or command of his parents, father or mother, or guardian, to perform labor suitable to his years and condition, or to attend school.

SEC. 2. That whenever any boy under the age of sixteen years shall be brought before any court of record of the District of Columbia, or any judge of such court, and shall be convicted of any crime or misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment, other than imprisonment for life, such court or judge, in lieu of sentencing such boy to imprisonment in the county jail, may, with the consent of such boy or his parent or guardian, suspend the sentence of punishment in the case, and commit the said boy to the care, control, and custody of the said trustees, to be taken to the said reform school, to remain until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, unless sooner discharged by the board of trustees. And in all cases where a boy, under the age of sixteen years, shall be brought before any such court or judge upon the charge of crime or misdemeanor, when the accusation against him is deemed supported by evidence sufficient to put him on trial, such court or judge shall have full power to stay all proceedings in the case, and to commit him, in like manner, for such period as such court or judge may determine, but not less than six months.

SEC. 3. That the mayors of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the president of the levy court of the District of Columbia, respectively, shall have full power to commit to the care, control, and custody of the board of trustees of said reform school, with the consent, and at the proper expense, of his parent or guardian, for such term as the board of trustees may determine, any boy such as is described in the third and fourth clauses of section one of this act.

I read this to show that the present amendment is simply following in the line of a wholesome, moderate, and entirely safe precedent in legislation in this District. I hope that Senators will give their approval to this attempt practically to aid a disinterested effort, founded upon private organization, and sustained up to this time by private means. I trust they will give it their approval by allowing this species of semi-parental control, discretionary in the magistrate, where these vagrant women and girls shall be found hanging upon the very verge of ruin, so that there may be the authority to commit them to a safe, kindly, and careful ministration and custody, where they will be sheltered from immoral associations and be taught the means of earning an honest livelihood. The institutions are here. They speak for themselves. They have been engaged in this work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Delaware has expired. We are now under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Delaware may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. Are we proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that there is anything further for me to say. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Delaware may be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Delaware be allowed to proceed.

Mr. INGALLS and others. Consent.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope he may be allowed to go on.

The PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Delaware will proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. I have a note here from a gentleman who was once the chief of police of this city and afterward one of the commissioners of the District, a well-known and highly-respected citizen of this city for the last thirty years at least. I refer to Maj. Thomas P. Morgan. He wrote me this note:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am glad to know that you favor the movement in behalf of the unfortunate and are giving your assistance to obtain the proper legislation to accomplish the great end. I am and always have been an earnest advocate of the proposed establishment of the House of the Good Shepherd. If I can give you or the committee any information touching this important matter I would be pleased so to do.

I could confirm this with other letters of a similar tenor. But of this I am satisfied, and this it is that has enlisted my voice in behalf of the amendment.

I for one am only too grateful when I can discover intelligent, active, organized benevolence performing those duties toward the unfortunate classes of society to which I and every other man in this Chamber feel that we owe a debt of duty. Public spirit so far as I have been able to observe, disinterested effort to serve the public without pecuniary reward and simply for the sake of performing a duty of humanity that rests upon each of us which ought to rest upon all of us and yet which is so seldom attended to by any, is rare. I mean to say that whenever I find upright, intelligent persons devoting themselves and their means to a public charity I feel myself personally indebted to them, I think society as a whole is greatly indebted to them. Here we have two charitable institutions that I propose Congress should now aid, and in what I consider a duty of Congress, organized charities founded upon private means, sustained by private means, who have never yet had from Congress a farthing in aid of the meritorious acts to which they have so zealously devoted themselves.

Now, when the opportunity comes under the form of a wise and beneficent police regulation to strengthen the hands of those who are engaged in well-doing, when it is justified by the legislative precedents which I have before me and have read to the Senate, I trust there may be no hesitation, considering the condition of this District, considering the anomalous form of its government, that it has no representative in either branch of Congress, that the people have no powers of local self-government, that they can not tax themselves and they can not refuse to pay the tax that others and strangers lay upon them, the duty upon Congress is more manifest. I think there have been few propositions appealing to just discretion and benevolence regulated by law than the proposition which I have had the honor to make to the Senate and which I hope will receive their approval.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

That whenever any female vagrant or incorrigible corrupt girl or woman of known evil repute and life is found soliciting vice upon the streets or elsewhere, or residing in a house of ill-fame, she may be sent under arrest either to the Home of the Good Shepherd, or to the Home of the Association for Works of Mercy, and required to labor at some suitable employment, and receive instruction and practical training; and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the support of such class of females in the said institutions, one-half of said sum being applicable to each of the said institutions.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I suppose we are all in accord with the Senator from Delaware in the accomplishment of the object of his amendment, but I undertake to say that if that amendment is ingrafted upon this bill no Senator who reflects upon it can vote for the bill. It virtually destroys the bill, and I put my objection upon high constitutional ground. The Senator from Delaware, if he is within the Constitution, by this amendment will accomplish much more than the correction of some of the evils that prevail in the District of Columbia. If you can without warrant and without process arrest one citizen, man or woman, of the District of Columbia and confine him or her in any place, call it what you please, a prison or a place of charity, and there compel him or her to labor, as the amendment provides, without trial by jury, then I say you can go into Salt Lake City, make the United States Army a police organization, and arrest every polygamist there and confine him without trial, and you can break up polygamy by this same process.

Sir, we have to consider these matters from a higher point of view than I have heard the Senator this morning advance. We have no more right to invade a house in the District of Columbia and take out people and confine them in a prison and subject them to labor—for such are the words of the amendment, save only that for "prison" here is substituted a charitable institution—than we have to go out into the States of this Union and take people and confine them without trial.

If there is any privilege guaranteed in this country that is higher than another, it is first that no person shall be arrested without due process of law, and second that every one arrested shall have the right to bail, and certainly shall not be put on trial without indictment or information, and certainly shall not be confined in a prison-house of any sort, I care not what the name of it may be, without a trial by a jury of his peers. The amendment goes beyond all that, and asks every Senator on this floor to vote that for some peculiar immoral practice which obtains here, as it obtains everywhere, this fundamental principle of the Constitution than which there is nothing higher and which I regard as the foundation upon which the whole superstructure of our institutions is built shall be violated.

I can indorse all the object, all the purpose of this amendment; but I care not what the offense may be, I care not who may commit the offense, I will always hold that there shall first be process for arrest, next there shall be indictment on information, and next there shall be all the incidents of trial, the right to bail, to a speedy, a public, and not an inquisitorial trial, and that finally there shall always be the presumption of innocence, and there shall be no conviction except by a jury, and no imprisonment until all these forms have been gone through with. This, sir, is the reason that I oppose the amendment, and if it be put upon the bill I can not conscientiously vote for the bill as it would stand if amended. The bill in terms is a bill to prevent the abduction of children. That was the object of the committee, that was the object of the gentlemen who framed the bill, it was the object of the judge of the police court who conferred with us about it; and I take it that when we have reached that point we can not go any further, we can not say that we will arrest these people and imprison them without trial. That we can not do, but we can use the preventive which this bill offers to the Senate and to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the amendment provides nothing new touching the liberty of any of these unfortunate people to whom it relates. If the Senator's mind is greatly wrought up to protect the personal liberty of the unfortunate class mentioned in the amendment he will find himself fully occupied by the terms of existing law. The power of arrest of this class of people exists to-day, and this amendment does not enlarge it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether this power to arrest subsists anywhere except in the legally constituted authorities of the District, and whether this amendment does not give that power to anybody and everybody in the District?

Mr. BAYARD. The question is too large to be answered whether it exists anywhere. I say it exists in this District under the authority of acts of Congress. I have them before me, and have read them, showing a discretion far greater in the court than any proposed by my amendment. The Senator misapprehends the scope of this amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Permit me to ask the Senator further whether the act of Congress allowed arrest in a house and whether it goes to the extent of allowing any citizen of the District of Columbia to make that arrest; and is not that the scope of the amendment?

Mr. BAYARD. No; the scope of the amendment will be found simply to allow the usual mode of arrest and committal by the magistrate, instead of sending one of this unfortunate class to jail, sending her where contamination will be stamped upon her, to commit her to a gentler, less degrading, and more merciful custody, where her morals and well-being will be protected in a way that no jail can provide for. That is as I understand the only effect of the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. The house to which they are to be sent is not a penal institution.

Mr. BAYARD. Not at all. It is not a penal institution. They are not sent there for punishment. They are sent there for safety and protection. Private benevolence has provided Magdalen asylums for those who have fallen; and this is a proposition simply to stretch out a friendly hand and to prevent their falling, the ounce of prevention that is worth ten thousand pounds of cure. This is not punishment; it is protection. It is not the deprivation of liberty beyond that which the law to-day I believe in every well-regulated community permits. When these people are found in the condition described by the amendment,

Any female vagrant or incorrigible corrupt girl or woman of known evil repute and life is found soliciting vice upon the streets or elsewhere—or residing in a house of ill-fame.

Certainly she is a subject for legal arrest then and for that cause—

Then comes the provision of the amendment that she may be sent where? To prison? To the association of people more vicious than herself? Not at all. This does not provide for that. She is not to be sent to jail; she is not to be shut in a cell; she is to be placed in the merciful custody of these charitable institutions where she shall be protected and receive food, clothing, shelter, and instruction in the arts of practical industries suitable to her sex, taught to be a good laundry-woman, taught to be a good seamstress, fitting her for honest and gainful occupation in life, so that when she goes forth, and at any time can go that she is fit to go, not to resume the evil practice and danger from which she once had been rescued, that she shall be enabled to go forth without shame to add to the respectability of society and not to its danger and degradation.

It is a mistake to suppose that there is a curtailment of liberty under this proposed amendment. Every curtailment of the liberty of this class exists to-day under the laws of the District. It is simply a question as to whether the persons in such danger or so offending shall be committed to the charge of these benevolent institutions, or whether they shall be sent to the prisons of the District where all the dangers from which they were sought to be rescued are intensified and where the criminality from which this amendment is intended to rescue them will become a fixed fact.

Mr. President, I apprehend that my regard for personal liberty is as great as that of any man. I have never willingly or intentionally violated the principles upon which laws must rest for their justification in restraint of human action; but there is a discretionary police control essential for the arrestation of crime before its commitment, applied to certain unprotected classes, and in regard to which every magistrate fit for his place must be invested with a certain discretion. I could state illustrations of this as given to me by worthy police officers of this city. They become aware that some child of tender years has been brought to this city, has fallen into evil associations away from her home, from all the protecting influences of kindred and affection, and that she has been inveigled into the very jaws of death. What can he do? Must he wait until her ruin is complete, or may he not take that homeless, helpless young creature and commit her, not to a jail or place of degradation but commit her to the friendly, the womanly, the protecting hands and sheltering arms that these two charitable institutions hold out in such a case? One of the two the Senate will decide upon, the commitment to the jail under the laws as they now stand or the commitment to the protection of one of these two benevolent associations. I prefer the latter, and I hope the Senate will.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator will permit me to ask him whether the bill does not provide for all he is discussing except——

Mr. BAYARD. It does not, because these two institutions I have named are the only two that provide for the kind of oversight and education of which these poor creatures so especially stand in need.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. They are the only two that ask pay for it, the only two that ask any appropriation. We have been able to find some other places to put them just as convenient and just as well calculated to accomplish the great object in view without the appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, much more than $10,000 have been paid by private hands in these institutions. To-day I am not prepared to state how many cases, but enough to make Congress see the earnest and excellent and the valuable work that has been done without the aid of a stiver from Congress; and now the question is, is the amount unreasonable or is the object unworthy? I do not think the Senate will vote either to be the case.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. In line 4, after the words "may be," I move to insert:

Arrested under a warrant duly issued from the police court of the District of Columbia, and upon conviction thereof by such court shall be sent.

Striking out the words "under arrest."

Yesterday, when I suggested that this bill had better go over, it struck me, on hearing the amendment of the Senator from Delaware read, that there were two things to be considered. The first was that the amendment enlarged the scope of the bill considerably, and the second, that the amendment itself should be more fully considered than the five-minute limit of debate would allow the Senate to devote to it. If the Senator from Delaware will examine the original bill he will see that provision is made for different classes, for arrest on warrant and for confinement after conviction by a court. His amendment, however, omits that, and permits a party, as he uses the language himself, to be arrested, and that necessarily carries with it the deprivation of liberty of the party. It is not worth while to say for how long it shall be done, or whether it shall be done with a rough hand or with a soft hand; still the liberty of the party is interfered with by the very terms of the amendment, "shall be arrested."

While it is true that sending a person to these beneficent institutions might not be termed a punishment, yet it comes in the way of a condemnation of the conduct of the party. It may be true that one of these homes to which she is to be sent is better than other places; it might be a better place than the Senate; it might be a better place to be in than the House of Representatives; but I expect none of us would like to be taken up and sent there even for a supposed crime that we might have committed. This is based upon the idea of supposed crimes, to be judged by whom? By a set of police officers, not judicial in their character; but when they imagine that a person is in a house guilty of ill-conduct or upon the streets guilty of it, all they have to do is to simply seize her and carry her off to this home of correction or whatever it may be called. That is not "due process of law" as we understand it in this country. All the States have laws of vagrancy; but no one can be committed without a conviction according to due process of law. No one can be condemned for vagrancy or any of the crimes or supposed crimes mentioned here in any of the States without a trial as we understand it at common law and a conviction had upon it.

Now, the evils are great; there is no mistake about that; and I sympathize entirely with the Senator from Delaware, as the Senator from Virginia said he did, but we must pause a moment and not vest these police officers, however good they may be, with this great power on mere suspicion to seize a woman or girl and send her without trial or without a hearing even to elysium or to any place better than this home if one could be imagined better. It will not do. It is contrary to the entire theory, to the entire system of our government. When women are seized and sent to an institution in this way without trial, the brand is upon them; you do not avoid the stamp that the Senator from Delaware would seem to intimate you avoid under this process of sentencing to a place of that character. Under this law any policeman, through caprice, through prejudice, through malice, or through hatred, can strike down the finest girl in the District. It will not do. I think the Senator from Delaware has put in his proposition rather prematurely. If the law as it now stands is as he reads and interprets it—I have not examined it—it should be repealed at once. I think with the amendment I have suggested all the good is accomplished that can be reached in this matter and under due forms and ceremonies of law.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the bill reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia for the protection of children in the District and for other purposes had a well-defined and ascertained object. It was intended to prevent on the part of unnatural parents and cruel guardians the ill-treatment of infants, to prevent their being abandoned, neglected, mistreated, employed in wicked occupations, or permitted to inhabit houses of ill-fame, and providing that in such cases these little unfortunate waifs should be taken care of and that those who permitted them thus to be mistreated should be punished by penalties provided by law. I sympathize fully with the objects that the Senator from Delaware has in view, and I shall not permit him to exceed me in admiration for the self-denying efforts of the noble men and women who have devoted their means and their time in this District, without other compensation than that which comes from the consciousness of well-doing, to the amelioration of the inevitable evils that always attend human society and that have been particularly apparent in this District. He states that his amendment is intended to care for that class which needs the tender hand of charity rather than the severe arm of the law. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator from Delaware can hardly have studied the language of his amendment. If the first four lines of this amendment do not describe hardened and abandoned criminals, I think that the dictionary would be searched in vain for epithets:

That whenever any female vagrant or incorrigible corrupt girl or woman of known evil repute and life is found soliciting vice upon the street or elsewhere, or residing in a house of ill-fame, she may be sent under arrest to either the Home of the Good Shepherd, or to the Home of the Association for Works of Mercy.

Mr. President, language would be scrutinized in vain for words that would more definitely describe the outcast, the hardened, abandoned, and reckless characters that infest our streets and that constitute one of the most dangerous classes of modern society; and yet the Senator says that the intention is, by his amendment, to deal gently with the erring, to uphold and sustain those who are in danger of falling, and to place under them the sustaining hand of mercy in order that they may be reformed without being subjected to the dangers of continued evil life.

The amendment, even as modified by the Senator from Arkansas, is entirely inconsistent with the purposes of the bill reported by the committee. It has no connection with the subject-matter of it. It deals with a different question and with a different class of criminals, and I submit that it opens the door to one or two very dangerous propositions.

In the first place, as has been significantly pointed out by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Virginia, it is unquestionably one of the most absolutely indefensible invasions of personal rights that could possibly be put in language. Without previous information, without any of the preliminary steps required by law, without requiring arrest by any officer of the law, absolutely without definition of authority, it authorizes, if I can read the language of the amendment correctly, any person to invade any house that may be alleged to be of evil repute and seize upon any female person that may be a resident thereof, and without trial and without conviction send her to one or the other of these two houses of refuge for an indefinite period of time It is an incarceration. It says these persons shall be required to labor at some suitable employment and receive practical instruction and training; and when that incarceration is to end, or when the objects of the law are to be held to have been accomplished, is left entirely, so far as I am able to perceive, to the discretion of the trustees or governing agents of these two institutions.

Mr. President, that is going too far. No one has a stronger desire than I have to uphold and sustain all great reformatory measures. The object of these statutes is the reformation of the offender and the protection of society. God alone has to do with punishment. And how the Senator from Delaware can justify upon either of these great objects of remedial and reformatory statutes the course that he proposes I am not able to understand.

Again, Mr. President, this is an unsavory subject to deal with. It is not a delicate matter to discuss. It deals with matters that are not fragrant and that are not agreeable to contemplate. But it appears to me, speaking plainly upon this subject, that the result of this amendment would be to turn over all that immoral class to which the amendment refers, all the harlots and prostitutes of this District, absolutely without limitation, to the care of these two institutions at the expense of the Government of the United States. That is a pretty large contract. It is a matter that I presume the Senator from Delaware would not think it within the purview of appropriate legislation to endeavor to accomplish; and yet the terms of his amendment are so broad, the language is so sweeping, that there is no escaping from this conclusion. There is no woman who comes in this category, no woman who has led an evil life, who is corrupt, incorrigible, of evil repute, who solicits vice upon the street or resides in houses of ill-fame, whether they be ten or whether they be a thousand, that may not be immediately taken into custody and turned over to the governing agencies of these two institutions and supported and maintained for an indefinite period of time at the expense of the United States Government.

Mr. President, that certainly is a dangerous principle to recognize. I believe with the Senator from Delaware in the reformation of offenders, that those who are in danger of falling should be protected, that those who are exposed to temptation should be fortified, and that every possible bulwark and barrier and rampart should be built up not only to protect society from these evils but to reform the offenders; and that we attempt to do in the bill which the committee have reported. This juvenile class, these young girls, children, who are wandering abroad upon the streets without shelter and without means of support, who are liable to become inmates of houses of ill-repute, society takes hold of with gentle hand, and they are to be turned over to these various institutions of charity for reformation and for care. But that in a bill of this kind, without due process of law, in violation of every one of the safeguards that surround personal liberty, we should be called upon in this summary manner to take charge of this dangerous class of our population is something that I believe on reflection the Senator from Delaware will admit ought not to be done. The subject should be dealt with in some other bill. I hope that he will see his way clear to enable us, without embarrassment and without the difficulties that will arise in the minds of some who desire to support this bill, to adopt this measure, which I am sure will commend itself to his own judgment, to his own sense of right, and to his own desire to protect society against those evils which his amendment deals with. That amendment exposes us to dangers and difficulties of such a nature that to my judgment the proposition ought not to be appended to this measure.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, when this subject was brought to my attention by residents of the District entirely entitled to my respect, I approved warmly of the idea of committing this unfortunate class of people, not to prison, not to a penal institution, but to a wise practical charity, and for that purpose that the Government should lend a portion of the public money to eke out private expenditures. It was difficult to find the precise nomenclature for this class of people, difficult to define the class whom it was intended to include, and I turned to the precedents of the legislation of this District, and I found in 1873 on the 26th of June, the Legislative Assembly of the District had provided for the care and for the compulsory restraint of a large class of girls and women who were to be committed to the Reform School. The language there used was:

> A reform school for girls and women, where any incorrigible, corrupt girl or woman of known evil repute, &c.—

Shall be committed. So in order to include another class not so vicious I interpolated the word "vagrant," and I believed then, and with due submission to my friend from Kansas I believe now, that the term "vagrancy" does not necessarily impute vice. I find in a lexicographer of authority that a vagrant is "a wandering, idle person, one who lives idly; no settled home; a strolling beggar." Now I apprehend that all of these descriptions may apply to a young girl or woman who is not vicious but who, as we all see from these descriptions, is very apt to become so.

The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, to a great part of which I take no exception but to a part of which I do take exception, is that he would require conviction to precede the relief which I design to procure. With due respect to him, that would defeat the very object I have in view. It is not where the sin has been committed, it is not where the vice has been irreclaimably established, it is for those who are about to be and in the very nature of things will become vicious that this relief is sought to be extended. If it be thought proper that warrant in due form should issue upon the statement of a police officer or any citizen who knows the fact, I have no objection; and in truth, considering that this would run in with the rest of the bill and be subject to the construction of the former sections, I took it for granted that this would not be a mere summary verbal execution of the power without limit; I took it for granted that the issue of process in due form was implied in this additional section of the law which I propose.

While I will not say that reflection might not provide a definition more accurately suited to the class contemplated for relief, yet I do believe that the word there used, "vagrant," will include a class not yet irredeemably vicious. If that be so, the fact that it will also include those who are vicious and whose reformation we also seek, does not weaken the force or the value of the amendment that I have proposed. I take it the whole force and meaning, certainly the object I had in view, was that there should not be a commitment to the common jail, which ought only to occur after conviction, but that there might be the commitment upon due examination of the case, as has been provided by the act which I have read in relation to the youth of the other sex. The law of 1870, approved by the President, and passed of course by Congress, provides:

> And in all cases where a boy, under the age of sixteen years, shall be brought before any such court or judge upon the charge of crime or misdemeanor, when the accusation against him is deemed supported by evidence sufficient to put him on trial, such court or judge shall have full power to stay all proceedings in the case, and to commit him, in like manner, for such period as such court or judge may determine, but not less than six months.

That is a commitment to a penal institution. I propose nothing of the kind. If it should turn out that there has been misapprehension, if the extravagant illustration which has been used of the entry into respectable houses in this city should prove true, if the liberty of worthy and refined and excellent people should be sought to be imperiled by the outrage, for such it would be, of a false charge of this nature, the remedy is immediate, and the punishment would follow. But you must deal with facts practically——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair must call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the fact that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. BAYARD. I understood, if the Chair pleases, that we were not proceeding in this case under the five-minute rule. I was so assured by the Senator who preceded the honorable Senator in the occupancy of the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill has not been relieved from the operation of Rule VIII; and under Rule VIII no Senator can exceed five minutes, nor can any Senator speak upon the same question oftener than once.

Mr. BAYARD. May I inquire whether there was not permission asked and given by unanimous consent that I should exceed the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon another occasion the Senator's time was extended by unanimous consent to any extent the Senator chose to proceed, but that unanimous consent can not be considered to apply to a second, or a third, or a fifth speech.

Mr. BAYARD. This is, I believe, the second, and not the third or fifth; but I bow to the construction of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. INGALLS. In order to obtain the sense of the Senate on this proposition without requiring two votes, I move to lay the amendments on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay the amendments on the table.

Mr. BAYARD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I do not know how he would vote. Of course there is no politics in this question, but I will abstain from voting, as this is an amendment of his colleague's.

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 18; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Kansas to lay the amendment on the table is carried. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I think there are some amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the bill has been reported to the Senate and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel of South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE YELLOWSTONE PARK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 221) to amend sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park.

Mr. VEST. For myself I have no doubt of the correctness of the statement I made yesterday, that under that clause of the bill which extends the laws of Montana over the park for the protection of life and property neither the county nor the Territorial authorities of Montana would have a right to establish a license for gambling or for a dram-shop within the limits of the park; but in order to put that question beyond a doubt I have drawn an amendment which I will now offer to the sixth section of the bill. I have been informed by the Delegate from Montana that it is contemplated at the next session of the Territorial Legislature to create a new county out of that portion of the county of Gallatin which lies immediately north of the National Park and adjoining it, and in order that this jurisdiction may be vested in that new county adjacent to the park the amendment deals with that subject also. The amendment is, after the word "provide," in the seventh line of the sixth section——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that an amendment in the nature of a substitute having been already agreed to in Committee of the Whole, no change in that amendment can be made while the bill remains in committee. Amendments by way of additional sections would be in order, but no change or modification of the former amendment. When the bill is in the Senate, then it will be open to amendment in every respect.

Mr. VEST. I was not aware of the fact that the amendment reported had been adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. Now the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be in order.

Mr. VEST. I move, then, to amend the amendment by inserting in section 6, line 7, after the word "provide:"

Or of such county as may be hereafter created out of that part of Gallatin County immediately north of the park and adjoining thereto; and it is hereby expressly provided that nothing herein contained shall empower the county or Territorial authorities of Montana to license gambling or dram-shops within the limits of the park or in any manner to interfere with the control of the Secretary of the Interior over the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 17 of section 4, after the word "possession," I move to insert "within the said park."

Mr. VEST. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, because if adopted it would nullify the object of the section entirely. Dead bodies of the game killed in violation of this law would be taken outside of the limits of the park, and the parties having possession of them would not be amenable to any punishment. There is another portion of the bill which prohibits railroad companies and express companies from carrying these bodies within the park. It simply amounts to nothing, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, to say that these persons shall be punished if the bodies are found in the park, because as soon as they kill the game and load their wagons they would immediately hurry to the limits of the park, and when they were over in the adjacent territory there would be an end of it; they could laugh at the law, take their game to market, and freely commit the very offense we propose to prevent.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the Senator from Missouri does not apprehend the effect of this amendment. The portion of the section to which my amendment applies affects the question of evidence merely, and not of the commission of the offense. The bill, as it is reported by the committee, provides that:

Possession of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any of the animals or birds hereinbefore mentioned shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act.

This is only a question of evidence, and as the bill now stands any person found in possession of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any of the animals or birds killed in any place, would be presumptively guilty of having committed the offense within the park. Persons in possession of these dead bodies of birds or animals at any place in the vicinity would be presumed to have killed them in the park. The bill presumes guilt outside of the limits of the park. This is certainly a burden which should not be thrown on any citizen. It is a violation of the presumption of innocence where a person is charged with a crime, and the amendment only qualifies the provision with respect to the effect of the possession as evidence. Of course the fact of guilt may be proved by any other evidence.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask to have the amendment reported for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, section 4, line 17, after the word "possession," it is moved to insert "within the said park;" so that the clause will read:

Possession within the said park of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any of the animals or birds hereinbefore mentioned shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that the section as it stands is at all susceptible of the interpretations which the Senator from Minnesota places upon it. The offense prohibited is the killing within the park. Certainly the possession is a possession within the limits where the killing is prohibited, even as the section reads. The Senator as a judge—and if his ambition runs that way I hope he may be—I think would hardly decide that under this section the possession of a part of a buffalo or deer here in the District of Columbia was intended to be made prima facie evidence of a violation of the law against killing a buffalo or a deer in the National Park. Still, if his amendment only makes it clearer and he desires it, I have no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think it had better be inserted as a construction of the act. I think there would be a very great difference of opinion on the position taken by the Senator from Indiana upon the language as it stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out section 3 beginning at the words "and the Secretary of War," in line 11 inclusive, to the close of the section. Let the Secretary report the part to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, after the word "act," in line 11, it is proposed to strike out the words:

And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to make such details of troops as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, may require for the purpose of preventing trespassers or intruders from entering the park with the object of destroying the game therein or other illegal purposes, and for removing such persons from the park.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the amendment of the committee places this territory, as I understand, under the jurisdiction of Montana or Wyoming——

Mr. VEST. Montana.

Mr. INGALLS. Montana. In addition to that it is placed under the control of the Secretary of the Interior; and as if that were not sufficient, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to call on the Secretary of War to use the Army for still further protection of this region. While I doubt the propriety of the Government going into the show business, or engaging in the protection and exhibition of geysers, still as it appears to meet the approbation of the committee that this shall be done, I suppose nothing further can be said except to suggest that the provisions for the regulation of this territory are anomalous. If offenders against the laws of the United States are to be punished, it would seem that there should be some reason more than has been given why in addition to being subjected to the penal statutes of Montana they should also be subjected to the arbitrary directions of the Secretary of the Interior, and still further than that, put under martial restraint and expelled by the Army of the United States. I can not understand why this extraordinary aggregation of power should be created with regard to this particular portion of the territory of the United States. Practically it places it under martial law. I can not conceive that there is any such great danger of invasion, or insurrection, or violation of the primal rights of man, that the ordinary tribunals of the land will not be sufficient to punish those who may offend against the provisions of this proposed act.

Mr. VEST. As to the propriety of Congress having passed the act setting apart the National Park originally I have very little to say. The park was created by Congress before I was a member of this body, and the act was passed, I believe, with great unanimity. The question presented now to the Congress of the United States is whether the park shall be abandoned and left without law, without control, and given up to the vandals who go in for the purpose of destroying the game and the objects of curiosity and wonder in the park.

As long as it is a park and as long as the statute remains unrepealed which created it it ought to be protected, and it ought to be made what the act says it should be, a place of recreation and resort for the American people. If it is proposed to turn it back into the public domain, then the act should be repealed and the geysers and all the other objects of wonder and curiosity in the park should be put up to be grabbed by the first party who can enter them at the General Land Office of the Government. I take it for granted, as the act is unrepealed, that Congress proposes to protect the park.

Heretofore there has been no legal jurisdiction over the park. There have been three murders committed there within the last eighteen months, and the offenders have gone unwhipped of justice. Wyoming has no jurisdiction over it, because the terms of the original act set it apart as a national park and take it out of the public domain. If there is any analogy to this statute upon the statute-book of the United States it is the act creating the District of Columbia. The courts of Wyoming have no jurisdiction, the courts of Montana have no jurisdiction, the Federal courts have no jurisdiction over this territory; and the result has been that no punishment can be inflicted for any crime known to the criminal law. This state of things of course can not continue. Recently the park has been largely visited. Hotels have been constructed there, against my judgment, but they have been constructed, and a population has gone there, temporary in its nature it is true, but a population among which crime can be and is committed, and there must be some punishment provided for it.

While the bill which the Committee on Territories reports puts the park under the jurisdiction of the laws of Montana, the park itself is so far removed almost from civilization that parties of men have gone in there continually and are in the habit of going in there in numbers of five and ten and even twenty, armed to the teeth, for the purpose of destroying the game in order to ship it to market. Two thousand elk were killed there in one season. There has been no authority there to resist these men. The Superintendent of the park, with ten assistants, men unused——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. VEST. I move that the consideration of this bill be continued.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri how long the consideration of the bill will take.

Mr. VEST. It will take only a very short time.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no objection to giving unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill for a few minutes, if that will answer the purpose of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of the bill by unanimous consent, for what length of time?

Mr. PENDLETON. Subject to the call that I shall make if it is not soon disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Subject to the call of the Senator from Ohio. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. VEST. I was about to say that the force at the command of the superintendent of the park under the amendment to the sundry civil appropriation act which we passed at the last session, that force consisting of ten assistants, is utterly inadequate to cope with the hunting parties that go in in sufficient numbers and so armed that they can bid defiance to the superintendent and to his assistants.

The park as organized to-day has within it 3,300 square miles. If the bill passes 2,000 more square miles will be added to it, and every Senator will recognize at once the propriety of giving to the Secretary of the Interior the power to call upon the Secretary of War in addition to the civil authorities for such number of troops as may be necessary to protect the game in the park and to resist trespassers and marauders within its limits. It is no extraordinary power, because the National Park is in such a condition that at times nothing but the Army amounts to anything, and it is absolutely necessary to have such a provision in order to protect it.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill is an illustration of the mischiefs that always attend the undertaking by Government of any work which should be left to individual enterprise. In my judgment the best thing that could be done with that Territory would be to remand it to public domain, and allow the curiosities that exist there, the game that lives there, and the waters that flow there, to be taken care of as the other great objects of interest in this country are, by men who feel a special individual interest in them.

We are entering upon what will eventually be a department of this Government in the control of the Yellowstone Park. We have already placed it under the control of the laws of the Territory of Montana and made it an appanage of the county of Gallatin. In addition to that, as I said, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make and publish rules and regulations for its government, for the management and care of the Territory, for the preservation of timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, wonderful objects, and for the preservation of the game animals found in the park, and to prevent their capture or destruction. As if that were not sufficient, he is authorized to call upon the Secretary of War, without limit as to the number of troops that are to be employed, and upon suggestion have the Army of the United States turned in there to expel trespassers and to carry out the objects for which the reservation was made. In addition to that, the superintendent and his assistants, who are appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, are required to reside continuously in the park, and it is made their duty to protect the game and public property, to preserve the peace, and to prevent crime. For this purpose, in addition to all the other powers conferred upon the Territorial officers of the Territory of Montana, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, and the Army of the United States, they are authorized to arrest all persons committing any crime or misdemeanor within the park, and to have all powers and duties conferred by law upon the sheriffs and constables for the Territory of Montana and their deputies. So that for this sacred domain that is withdrawn from the operation of the public land laws of the United States we have an anomalous system of government such as is found nowhere else upon the face of the earth, confounding the functions of various departments of the Government and exposing persons who violate the law to multifarious and complicated punishment.

But this is not all. The superintendent and assistants are to be paid large salaries. The superintendent is to be paid an annual salary of $2,000, and he is to have a corps of fifteen assistants, who are to be paid annually $900 each. Then, beyond this, the Secretary of War is required to detail an officer from the Corps of Engineers, whose duty it shall be to survey and lay out suitable roads in the park, to select the proper location for bridges, and his estimates as to the cost of all these improvements are to be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of War, with other recommendations in regard to improvements that are to be made.

Mr. President, we are on the threshold of a very large and constantly increasing annual expenditure for the improvement of this property. I have not been able to compute yet the amount that will be necessarily expended under the terms of this bill, but it will be many thousand dollars, in addition to the indefinite amount that is to be appropriated on the suggestion of the Engineer Department with regard to permanent improvements which are to be made there for the purposes of pleasure and recreation hereafter.

I should be glad, as I said before, if this whole project would be abandoned. There are other great natural objects of interest in this country, the cañons of the Colorado, and inaccessible mountain summits, and cataracts, and caverns in the earth, and other objects and places that it would be agreeable to visit and that it would be acceptable to the people in the neighborhood to have protected and cared for and decorated and ornamented at the expense of the Government of the United States. I think the original segregation of this territory from the public domain was a mistake, a mistake that is becoming more apparent as time goes on and as we see the great expense which is ultimately to be involved; but in any event I should hope that until there is greater evidence of necessity for departure from the ordinary constitutional protections which surround the citizen that portion of the bill which authorizes martial law to be declared and the Secretary of War to order the Army turned in for the purpose of expelling offenders might be omitted from the bill.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me before he takes his seat, I will say that that can only be done upon the approval of the President, who is at the head of the Army, and only in extraordinary cases. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is quite an adequate answer to a good deal that has been said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. The provision of the bill which it is now sought to strike out is not one belonging to the ordinary administration of power. It is an extraordinary remedy, one that never would be invoked unless a case should arise such as has been suggested.

Mr. INGALLS. Such as what?

Mr. HARRISON. Such as the Senator from Missouri has suggested. If an armed body of men, fifteen or twenty men, as he said, armed as those men are, and desperate as some of them are, should go in, defying the laws which have been made for the park and should enter upon a wholesale slaughter of the game there, then under this provision, which could only be put in force by an appeal to the power of the President as the head of the Army, those men might be removed from the park. It may be that we shall never need to call into exercise the power conferred in this provision of the bill. Perhaps I should not be going too far if I said probably we never shall; but the time may arrive when it would be needful, and as it is not likely to result in harm I think it would be wise to leave the provision in the bill.

I do not feel disposed, any more than the Senator from Missouri, to follow the Senator from Kansas in the wider discussion which he suggests, whether we have not made a mistake in establishing the National Park. It has been done. I believe I would be willing to go further. Indeed, I did at the last Congress introduce a bill setting apart and withdrawing from occupation the cañon of the Colorado, to which he has referred. I believe it was wise to make the provision with reference to the Yellowstone Park. There may be other sections of this country which should be brought under similar regulations. I would not, however, include under such regulations those inaccessible mountain peaks to which the Senator from Kansas has referred.

Mr. DAWES. I think if my views of this matter were what those of the Senator from Kansas appear to be I should have been led with him to offer or to support the amendment which he has moved. If I believed it to be unwise to preserve these great natural curiosities for the effect their preservation would have upon the people, if I thought it was an idle waste of money or something worse than that, I would strike at the vitality of the whole matter and endeavor to undo it as early as I could. But if I believed that it were worth while to do something else than to consider solely the gain in money that comes from any use of the public land, if I supposed it were within our constitutional power to beautify or adorn or preserve that which is already beautiful and grand in scenery about the property and territory of the United States, then I would use all the means necessary for carrying out that purpose. For instance, if I thought it was wise to beautify and adorn the grounds around this Capitol, to make walks, to make drive-ways, to set out trees, to erect fountains, or anything of that kind; if I believed that were within the constitutional power of the Government, and I thought that indirectly good would come of it, then I would take care of it; then I would appoint the Capitol police; then I would subject them to the control of some branch of the Government—the Secretary of the Interior perhaps. I would make them subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior should make, subject to the approval of the President of the United States; and if it were necessary in order to preserve them from trespasses committed by night and by stealth or trespasses committed in defiance of regulations, I would resort under the Constitution to such necessary force as is at the command of the President of the United States, there being authority somewhere under the Constitution of the United States to make all needful rules and regulations touching the public property and the territory of the United States. I would consider at the outset whether it were worth while to do anything, and if I thought it worth while to do anything then I would use all the means necessary to carry it out, if you are to have a park, if it be worth while not to turn this all over to anybody, through pre-emption laws or homestead laws or tree-culture laws or some other mysterious laws in reference to the public domain, which I do not understand, whereby a man comes up all of a sudden with a thousand acres of public domain without having spent a dollar. I do not know how it is done; I only know it is done. I only know that we have territories of 100,000 or 150,000 square miles to-day every foot of which almost is in the possession of somebody under the homestead, pre-emption, and tree-culture laws, and the whole population amounts to only a few thousand.

If it is best to turn over this National Park to that sort of administration of the law and let the land be preserved or dealt with, to use the language of the Senator from Kansas, as would be certainly the case, somebody would have a homestead on Old Faithful before night. Then I would suggest, as the Senator from Kansas very properly does, to take the vitality out of the bill, not permit the protection of the park. I would not go through the vain and empty pretense of preserving this grand scenery, the like of which hardly exists in the world; I would not go through with the pretense of it before the world, unless I was prepared to take care of it and preserve it. I would make haste to announce to everybody that the first who can light on it shall under some homestead or pre-emption right appropriate it to himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out section 8 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War shall detail an officer from the Corps of Engineers, whose duty it shall be to survey and lay out suitable roads in said park and select the proper location for bridges therein; and the Secretary of War shall, upon the report of said officer, make annual estimates for the cost of such improvements, and communicate the same to Congress, with such other recommendations in regard to the park as he may deem proper; and all sums received by the Secretary of the Interior from rents in the park, or arising from fines or forfeitures for violations of the laws and regulations made for the government of said park and protection of the game and public property therein, shall be applied to the improvements hereinbefore mentioned; and the officer or officers collecting said fines and forfeitures shall pay the same to the superintendent of the park, to be accounted for by him to the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. [Having put the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. INGALLS. I presume that if the amendment were understood it would probably receive assent. I can not suppose that after having reserved this property the Senate desires immediately to enter upon a series of improvements without any information or suggestion as to what is to be done or the amount of money to be expended.

This section provides that the Secretary of War shall at once detail an officer to survey and lay out suitable roads in the park and select the proper location for bridges, and upon that report being made annual estimates are to be communicated to Congress, with recommendations for action, which involves, of course, the expenditure immediately of an indefinite sum of money. It appears to me that considering the remote region and the few that are likely to visit it Congress would hardly be willing at this time to enter upon a system of improvements the amount of which no one can understand and about which no computation whatever has been made. It would be sufficient, it appears to me, if for the present this property is protected from danger by invasion and by the killing of game and by the destruction of the natural objects of interest.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Kansas is mistaken. I hold in my hand now the printed report of the engineer officer who has been engaged in surveying the park and laying out roads and locating bridges, and the entire amount, as he specifies, of the improvements that are to be made, if all of them are made, will reach $210,000.

If there is any portion of the bill reported by the Committee on Territories which it seems to me should commend itself to the Senate it is the eighth section. Thousands of persons are visiting the park, and the increase will be beyond calculation in the future. There were thousands there during the last summer, and it is fair to presume that there will be a great many more during the next and at each recurring season; and not to improve the roads in the park would be simply to say that persons should not travel in any comfort or with any convenience within its limits.

As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] very well said, if we have the park let us treat it as a national park. If, on the other hand, we are to adopt the idea advanced by the Senator from Kansas and throw it open as a part of the public domain, then as a matter of course not a dollar should be expended upon it for any purpose. For myself I am not afraid to say that every dollar expended on the National Park judiciously will be money well expended. It would be an outrage upon the American people, in my judgment, to say that any man should be permitted to go there and put his homestead upon those geysers, or upon that incomparable scenery of the great Yellowstone Cañon, or upon the Yellowstone Lake. Nowhere else upon this continent certainly, and I believe not in the whole world, is such scenery to be seen.

I have not yet come to that materialistic state of mind when I think that the Natural Bridge in Virginia should be macadamized, that the great Mammoth Cave of Kentucky should be used as the incipient point for an underground railroad, or that the water-power of Niagara should be used for a mill. I believe that the people of the United States are entitled, on account of the magnitude and grandeur of their possessions, to have just such a place as it was intended should be set apart by the original act, and while the act remains upon the statute-book there is but one duty for us to perform, which is to preserve that park and to carry out the intent and purpose of the legislation already had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asked the Senator from Missouri yesterday to state this morning why this territory, which is wholly within the area of the Territory of Wyoming, should be attached to the Territory of Montana, and he promised to give an answer, but the reply has not yet been made. I should like to hear that.

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure. As the Senator from Kentucky did not repeat the question, I did not, having charge of the bill, think it was good parliamentary practice to intrude the subject, not because I sought to avoid it.

All those familiar with the approaches of the National Park know that the travel to it comes in from the north. I have a map, which I wish could be seen by each Senator in order that the subject might be fully understood, which shows that access from any other adjacent Territory except from the north is almost impossible. I use this, of course, in the limited sense.

Wyoming, from which this park was taken, has the seat of government at Cheyenne, on the Union Pacific Railroad. If the park is made for jurisdictional purposes a portion of the Territory of Wyoming, then criminals or persons arrested under the laws of Wyoming would have to be taken over the mountains, the Wind River Mountain, the Shoshone, the Teton range, a distance of from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and seventy-five miles, on horseback, it being impossible to travel there by vehicles, involving a trip of from three to four weeks, under guard, before they could be lodged in jail or brought before an officer; or, if not taken in this manner, they would have to be carried to Cinnabar, which is on the limits of the park; then out to Livingston, upon the North Pacific road; then east upon the North Pacific to where the Union Pacific could be connected with, and then carried down the Union Pacific to Cheyenne, a distance of several hundred miles.

A great deal has been said about this portion of the bill. I have been assailed in the newspapers of Cheyenne for attacking the Territorial sovereignty of that people. It is ridiculous, Mr. President. I have no personal interest in the matter. I could have no prejudice politically or personally against the Territory of Wyoming. All that I sought to do was to save expense to the Government and to bring about a speedy administration of justice.

As the matter now stands the Northern Pacific road has constructed a branch from Livingston down to Cinnabar, which is within five or six miles of the great mammoth Hot Springs hotel. All the crimes will, of course, be committed around the geysers and around the hotels. If the park is added to Montana the criminals could be taken to the railroad in less than an hour, carried over to Livingston, the county seat of Gallatin County, lodged in jail, and brought to a speedy trial, without expense, without delay; but, on the other hand, if attached to Wyoming, you are bound, as I said, to carry them six hundred or more miles by rail or one hundred and fifty or one hundred and seventy-five miles through the mountains, with all the dangers of escape and all the extraordinary expense attending such transportation. That is the whole of it. If any Senator at all familiar with the region will look at the map he will appreciate the absolute necessity of giving this jurisdiction to Montana instead of Wyoming.

The bill was passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 3d instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 1490) to complete a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy; and Joint resolution (S. R. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

POST-OFFICE LEASES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being Senate bill No. 343.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 1508) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes. It is a very short bill, authorizing the Postmaster-General to rent buildings for the first, second, and third class post-offices for a term not exceeding ten years. The difficulty about the matter is that the Court of Claims have decided that post-offices can not be rented beyond the life of the appropriation, beyond a year. That embarrasses the Department very much. A little over a year ago we passed an act readjusting the salaries of postmasters, and cut down the third class very severely, and it puts them under very great inconvenience. I do not think any man can object to the bill, and I have stated all that is in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be laid aside, in order that the Senate may consider the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the bill for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster-General may lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly; but no lease shall be made for a term exceeding ten years; and whenever any building, or part of a building, under lease, becomes unfit for use as a post-office, no rent shall be paid until the same shall be put in a satisfactory condition for occupation as a post-office, or the lease may be canceled, at the option of the Postmaster-General; and a lease shall cease and terminate whenever a post-office can be moved into a Government building.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that the time named for the lease, ten years, is unusual. If I remember correctly——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that the question now is, is there objection to laying the unfinished business aside informally to consider the bill?

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall make no objection provided it is certain that the bill will not take much time and if I can have the liberty of displacing it by calling for the regular order in case it shall do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, subject to the call of the Senator from Ohio in charge of the unfinished business? The Chair hears none. The bill has been read and will be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to suggest that the time named for the duration of the lease, not exceeding ten years, I think is not consistent with the existing provisions of law with reference to the hiring of buildings for post-offices of a higher class. My recollection is that such leases are limited to four years.

Mr. SAWYER. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Kansas that the Department has been in the habit of making leases for ten years. I know of a great many leases made for ten years. But a case came up before the Court of Claims some time during last year, from Pennsylvania, for rent, and the court decided that the Department could not rent the building beyond the time for which the appropriation was made.

Mr. ALLISON. Beyond a year.

Mr. SAWYER. It embarrasses the Department very much. In a great many instances they can get a building fitted up and rent it for six, eight, or ten years at a very low rental, when if they could only rent it for one year they could not probably get it fitted up at all. It embarrasses the Department in the whole arrangement. I think the bill ought to be left as it is in regard to the term of the lease.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be unwilling to allow the officers of one administration to make a lease extending over the period of two administrations to follow and the half of the next. It seems to me that upon the mere suggestion the difficulty is obvious, that the power is too great. The discretion ought not to be allowed by the bill. Hitherto the leases have been, as the Senator from Iowa suggests, limited to one year, or the period of the appropriations, which would be two, although I have known instances where the term has been four years. I should like to have an amendment made to the bill which would limit it to four years at the outside.

Mr. SAWYER. I know that a great many leases have been made for ten years, and that course has worked well.

Mr. HOAR. If the Postmaster-General is honest, it is very important, it seems to me, that he should have a discretion such as the bill gives him to in proper cases make a lease not exceeding ten years. Almost all these buildings are obtained by the Government at an exceeding low rate, there being a great desire, in view of its effect on the business part of a growing town or city where the post-office is situated, to get the post-office in a particular spot. In a very considerable number of growing towns and cities where there are no United States courts and no Government buildings are built for the purpose, if the lease is only for four years in all cases it would be impossible to get persons to erect buildings or to lay out very large sums in fitting them up for post-office purposes on terms which would be advantageous to the Government. It seems to me that the Postmaster-General can be trusted (as it is presumed that every officer of the Government has at heart the interests of the Government) to have this discretion, and no doubt the Government would be a great loser by limiting the lease to four years.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin who introduced the bill that a discretion extending to one hundred years would be still more valuable than one extending to ten years. The Postmaster-General could undoubtedly get better terms for the Government if he were authorized to make a lease for a hundred years. That would be something worth having.

Mr. SAWYER. I think that would be too long.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the object in view, I suggest to the Senator that if the discretion can be allowed it should be extended so as to give the Government the full benefit of it.

There is a natural limitation in all these matters, and that is the duration of an administration. If the lease were extended to ten years great inconvenience might often result to a community. The center of business might change. The Postmaster-General might accept a location and make a lease for ten years and the entire current of business might change in the town; railroads might be constructed, business might move away into other localities, and great inconvenience result.

It seems to me that the objections are obvious, but of course the Senator, having introduced and reported the bill, has given it due consideration, and I therefore make these suggestions for him to reply to, if he thinks best.

Mr. SAWYER. We considered this matter in committee very carefully, and all those questions came up. If we fix the term of the lease at four years the leases would not all be made at the commencement of an administration; they would run over.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not say the commencement of an administration, but the period of an administration.

Mr. SAWYER. I am very decidedly of the opinion that the bill ought not to be changed, and that ten years is not too long a time.

Mr. INGALLS. Would not a hundred be better?

Mr. SAWYER. No, I think not. I believe that ten years is long enough, giving the Department a right within ten years to lease the property. I hope there will be no amendment made to the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. The reason which actuated the committee was our desire to secure the best building practicable upon the best terms. Every one who has had experience in matters of rent knows that we can get a better building put up if the party who puts up the building obtains a long lease than if the lease is quite short. In a great many towns where there are no public buildings it is a matter of importance to the community to have the best post-office building that can be procured. We believed that if we should authorize the Postmaster-General to lease for a period not exceeding ten years it would secure a better building and would be better adapted to the convenience of the community than where the lease should be for one year or at the outside four years. Therefore I think the bill is proper and that the limitation of ten years is not unreasonable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

JUDICIAL JURISDICTION OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive.

Mr. HOAR. Has the bill been read at length?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read at length. It is now as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], before we are called upon to vote on this bill, turning to section 12, would explain under what provision of the Constitution of the United States Congress can appoint "two district judges of the United States for China and a district judge of the United States for Japan, whose terms of office shall be eight years, respectively." The clause of the Constitution with regard to the judicial power of the United States, article 3, section 1, is as follows:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

If, and I suppose it is true, this power is sought to be conferred under the clause of the Constitution that I have read, I am unable to see, in the first place, how a district judge of the United States can be appointed for a district beyond its jurisdiction; and, in the second place, how his term of office, if he be a district judge, can be limited to eight years, when the Constitution says that the office shall be held during good behavior.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will ask the Senator from Kansas whether his objection goes to the appointment of judges other than consuls in the consular districts in countries beyond the limits of the United States or whether it goes merely to the phraseology of the bill? If it goes to the mere phraseology of the bill and the Senator objects to calling them district judges for any reason, it is easy enough to amend the phraseology. If, however, he means to put into discussion the constitutional power of the Government of the United States to establish any courts or to appoint any judges beyond the territorial limits of the United States, that presents another question, and to either of them I can address myself.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like myself to hear from the Senator upon the language of the section, and I should also like to hear from him upon the constitutional power of Congress to create or designate district judges of the United States for China and Japan or any other extra-territorial region.

Mr. PENDLETON. As the Senator from Kansas rose I was about to take the floor for the purpose of offering two or three verbal amendments, and with the consent of the Senator before I answer his question I shall ask to have these amendments made in the way of perfecting the bill according to the amendments made yesterday.

In section 10, line 5, after the word "State," I move to strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may;" so as to read, "the Secretary of State may assign to each consulate;" so as to bring the assignment of consular clerks in China and Japan upon the same footing with the assignment of consular clerks in other countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 16, line 19, after the word "for," I move to strike out the words "the same purposes at Constantinople and a building for a prison at Smyrna" and to insert "prisons at Constantinople and Smyrna;" so as to read:

And under like conditions, suitable buildings for prisons at Constantinople and Smyrna.

The effect of this will be to strike out the provision for a court-house at Constantinople and limit the public buildings there as at Smyrna to prisons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. After the word "Smyrna," on line 20 of section 16, I move to add these words:

And the consul-general at Siam shall purchase or lease for a similar period, and under like conditions, a suitable building for a prison at Bangkok.

The suggestion is made that I should change the language there to "may" instead of "shall," and insert "under the direction of the Secretary of State."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. Now, Mr. President, addressing myself to the question that was asked by the Senator from Kansas, I say again that if there is any objection to the phraseology of this section by which these judges are called district judges of the United States, that can easily be obviated by adopting other phraseolgy which will be equally pertinent and to which, perhaps, there will be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. May I make a suggestion at this point to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to amend section 12 by inserting after the word "that," in line 1, the words "for the purposes of this act;" after the word "two," in line 2, by striking out the word "district;" after the word "judges," in line 3, striking out the words "of the United States;" in line 3, before the word "judge," at the close of the line, striking out the word "district;" and after the word "judge," striking out the words "of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose this as an amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest it as an amendment to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, section 12, after the word "that," insert "for the purposes of this act;" in line 2, after the word "two," strike out "district;" after the word "judges," in line 3, strike out "of the United States;" after the word "judge," in the same line, strike out the words "of the United States;" so that the clause will read:

That for the purposes of this act there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two judges for China and a judge for Japan.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether if those amendments be adopted his objection to the constitutionality of the bill is relieved?

Mr. INGALLS. It still appears to me, Mr. President, to be an open question, and a very interesting one, whether under the Constitution Congress has the power to provide for the appointment of judges for a country beyond its own jurisdiction, and upon that point I should like to hear the opinion of the Senator from Ohio who reported the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I think I have no objection to the verbal amendments suggested by the Senator from Kansas; and if I had found that he did not desire to pursue the discussion as to the constitutionality of the bill any further, I should immediately have accepted them; but if we are to have a discussion upon the constitutionality of the bill in other respects, I prefer not to give my assent at this moment to the amendments suggested, though I think they will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments have not yet been offered. They were simply read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I was not at liberty to offer them, because the Senator from Ohio had the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think we understood each other.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator, of course, will understand that the amendments, if agreed to, would require continuous modifications throughout the entire bill in the same line of thought.

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir. Mr. President, I think I have no objection to offer to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas as to the amendment of the phraseology, but he asks the question where there is constitutional power in the Government of the United States to establish courts and to appoint judges outside of the territorial limits of the United States.

Mr. President, I confess that is a question more easy for the Senator from Kansas to ask than for me to answer. I have heard the question discussed, as we all have, at various times. I have never been able to find myself, nor in truth have I ever heard suggested, the clause, in the Constitution of the United States which in so many words and explicitly gives authority for these extraterritorial courts. The subject, as I said before, has been discussed frequently in the Senate and in other places, in the Executive Departments, in the courts; and inasmuch as there is no single provision of the Constitution in so many words authorizing the establishment of these courts, the authority has been deduced from various provisions of the Constitution, and it has happened in this case, as it does in all others, that where you seek for implied powers they will be found in various clauses of the Constitution, and gentlemen will differ as to the sources from which those implied powers can be derived.

My honorable friend who sits before me, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], in a discussion of this question upon this floor gave it as his opinion, if I am not mistaken, that the authority was derived from the clause defining the judicial power of the United States, and he quoted the very language which the Senator from Kansas has just now read. I do not care to read it again. I think the Secretary of State, to one of whose documents I alluded yesterday as being sent to us by the President in a special message, derived the authority from that same source.

In a discussion that occurred upon this subject, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] expressed an opinion that this power was derived from the treaty-making power, if I did not misunderstand him, or, at least, was exercised under the authority of the country in which the jurisdiction was to be executed. I find that Judge Field, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Cavanaugh case, on application for a writ of habeas corpus, after a conviction had in one of the consular courts, examined very exhaustively this whole subject, and came to the conclusion also that the authority was to be found in the treaty-making power and the clauses of the Constitution which define the authority of treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution as being the supreme law. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] expressed an opinion that it was derived from the same source. The judge of the circuit court of the United States for California, in an examination of this same question which he made with a good deal of care, found it in the provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

While gentlemen undertake to derive this authority from these various clauses of the Constitution, I have to say that I have not found in a single instance that any gentleman in Congress or in the courts or in the Executive Departments intrusted with the duty of ascertaining the clause under which this power could be found has ever come to the conclusion that it does not exist. The late Senator from Wisconsin,

Mr. Carpenter, after arguing this question at very great length and with very great ability, denied that he was in a condition to dispute the authority of the Government of the United States to establish these courts, but said that, while he had doubt, the inclination of his opinion was in the direction of the authority. And I think I may very fairly say that no man has gone further in the expression of doubt of this power than the late Senator from Wisconsin.

I do not find it necessary, therefore, Mr. President, at this time to go further than to say that the concurrence of authority on this subject is that the power does exist in the Government of the United States under the Constitution to exercise jurisdiction within the limits of foreign countries to the extent to which that jurisdiction is allowed by the foreign country.

A very able Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Cushing, negotiated the treaty with China, and in a letter addressed to Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, declared that this authority existed, and he found it in the general powers of the United States rather than under any specific provision of the Constitution; he found it in the public law and the law of nations.

The first assertion of the duty and the power of Congress to establish these courts was made in 1848, when a bill was passed without dissent, without question of this authority, by a Senate of which Mr. Webster, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. John Davis, Mr. Jefferson Davis, Mr. Clayton, Mr. Benton, and Mr. Reverdy Johnson were members.

It is worthy of notice that the first treaty granting extraterritorial jurisdiction to the United States was negotiated with Morocco in 1787, the very year in which the Constitution of the United States was adopted; and this grant of extraterritorial jurisdiction, under that treaty, was undoubtedly considered by those who framed the Constitution. In 1788 a treaty of like kind was negotiated by Mr. Jefferson with France, and at the first session of the Congress of the United States that treaty was submitted to the Senate by General Washington and was ratified by a unanimous vote. Both of these treaties contemplated the exercise of this jurisdiction by courts established by Congress.

Now, sir, on this line of authority, I think it may be claimed that the power of the Government to exercise this jurisdiction through consular courts is well established, I claim that if there is authority in the Government to exercise this jurisdiction through consular courts, it is within the power of the Government to organize and constitute those consular courts as it sees fit. If the Congress of the United States may invest the consuls with judicial authority, it may also invest other persons than consuls, whom it chooses to call judges, with like authority. I think the power of the Government is fully established. I have relieved or will be willing to relieve this bill from the objection made by the Senator from Kansas if he thinks there is any objection to calling these judges district judges of the United States. I am willing that they shall be called by any other designation, provided we invest them with the authority which is here provided for district courts and supreme courts, those being convenient names for us to use in defining their relation to each other and to the consular courts.

That there is authority under the treaty to establish these courts there is no doubt, I mean so far as that authority and consent can be given by the foreign nations. In every instance where a consular court is established by this bill it is provided in the treaty that there shall be a consular court. In the case of China—I read the language of the treaty yesterday—it is so broad as that it assents expressly to the establishment of other courts than consular courts, declaring expressly that the jurisdiction shall be exercised under the authority and powers of the Government of the United States.

So I do not find any objection to the exercise of this power as defined in this bill. Certainly none if it shall be amended to avoid terms objected to by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not prepared to deny that there may be a bodily transfer of national sovereignty and national law to territory beyond the jurisdiction of the United States with the assent of the power to which the territory belongs; but it appears to me that that authority must be exercised, if it is to be exercised at all over the persons and property of citizens of the United States, in accordance with the Constitution; and my object in rising was to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to another provision of the bill in connection with the Constitution of the United States. Article 6 of the amendments in addition to the Constitution reads as follows:

> In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

I assume that nothing is better settled in the jurisprudence of this country than that in the trial of criminal causes a jury means a jury of twelve American citizens. While it is true that in minor causes the courts have held, as in suits before justices of the peace, that a jury of six may be permitted, yet the term "jury" means twelve men. Now, in view of that I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the provisions of this bill upon pages 38 and 39, which declare that a trial jury—and I assume that this applies to criminal as well as to civil proceedings——

Mr. PENDLETON. It does.

Mr. INGALLS. On page 37 of the bill it is declared:

> In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right of trial by jury; but he may waive the same and submit to be tried by the court alone, or he may plead guilty to the charge.

Further on, in section 40, will be found the provision that I was about to quote:

> A trial jury shall consist of five jurors, and shall be required to give a unanimous verdict.

Then follow other provisions relating to the qualifications of jurors, to the right of challenge, to pay for attendance and subsistence, and certain formal proceedings in connection with the final settlement of the fees that are due to jurors, after which occurs section 41:

> That if it shall be found impossible to obtain a trial jury of five competent persons among all the citizens of the United States in the consular district, the consul shall enter that fact on the record of his court, and proceed with a jury of three such citizens; and if it should be impossible to obtain a jury of three, he shall call on three disinterested persons not citizens of the United States, but otherwise qualified to act as jurors.

Under the provisions of this bill is it not true that an American citizen could be tried for a capital offense, if in China by a jury of three Chinese, if in Japan by a jury of three Japanese, if in Corea by a jury of three Coreans; and I ask whether the Senator thinks that provision of the bill is consistent with the rights that are guaranteed to an American citizen under the clause of the Constitution which I have read?

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, taking up the suggestion last made by the Senator from Kansas, I suppose he remembers that yesterday I moved an amendment to the bill, which I withdrew for the moment, providing that if there should not be a jury of five citizens obtainable in the district, others not citizens of the United States but otherwise having the qualifications of jurors might be called upon. Now, the Senator will remember that there is no provision in the Constitution which requires that jurymen shall be citizens of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose the Senator from Ohio would not seriously contend that within the jurisdiction of the United States a citizen would not be entitled to be tried by a jury of his peers; that is, in the language of the Constitution, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, and that if any court in the State of New York should summon a jury of Chinese or of Englishmen or of Frenchmen to try an American citizen for a criminal offense, it would not be good in law.

Mr. PENDLETON. In the State of Ohio, with whose jurisprudence I am more familiar than with that of any other State, the law of the State requires that the jurymen shall be citizens of the United States and of the State; but I am not aware of any decision of the courts of the United States which requires in the absence of express statute that the jurors shall be citizens of the United States; and if there be a provision of the statutes, which I think would be very proper and may possibly exist, I do not find in the Constitution of the United States anything that makes it obligatory upon Congress to pass a statute of that kind.

Now, I say very frankly that I would very much prefer to constitute these juries as they are ordinarily constituted in the United States and in England. I should be very glad to adopt the idea that a jury should be of twelve, but there are cases in which it is almost impossible under the limitations of this bill providing for challenges and other guarantees of the excellence of the jury, its intelligence and impartiality and fairness, in many of these consular districts after having exhausted the jurymen who are subject to disabilities, to find a jury of twelve.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the citizen who is arrested and tried in one of these extraterritorial courts lose any of his rights as a citizen under the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will answer that question by putting to the gentleman another. If it is found impossible, by reason of the paucity of population and the objections to jurymen, to impanel in any of these consular districts a jury of twelve men, shall the citizen go unwhipped of justice or be committed to the care of the native tribunals? If under the conditions in which a court is placed amid a small population of the country and in popular excitement, the small number eligible for a jury is exhausted so that he can not have from Americans there a jury which is impartial, is he to go without a trial at all and forever or is he to be committed to the tender mercies of the native tribunals?

Mr. INGALLS. If I owe the Senator $100 on a promissory note and have not the money, does that acquit me of the debt? If the citizen of the United States in a foreign country has constitutional rights, does the fact that the court can not give them to him deprive him of them?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir. I will answer that question very frankly. You can not deprive a citizen of the United States of any right to which he is entitled.

Mr. INGALLS. Is he not entitled, under the Constitution, to a trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime was committed?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir; but he is not under the Constitution entitled to a trial by a jury of twelve men, and he is not under the Constitution entitled to a trial by a jury of citizens of the United States. If you impanel a jury with all the guarantees which are ordinarily thrown around a jury-box for the purpose of giving an impartial, fair, and speedy trial, and if it is impossible to obtain a jury of twelve men who are citizens, then you must do the next best thing you can not prohibited by the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio if he intends to concede the question of the Senator from Kansas that when an American has offended against a Chinese law and is tried in China for a Chinese offense, the right to a trial by jury attaches to him and that our Constitution has anything whatever to do with it?

Mr. PENDLETON. I knew that when the time came I could hand that question over to my friend from Massachusetts, whom I have heard discuss it very learnedly once or twice or perhaps oftener on this floor; but, with all deference to him, the argument he made did not meet the entire assent of my judgment, although I have grave doubts whether he is not right. But I maintain that under this clause of the Constitution, when we attempt to administer justice in these countries, if we impanel a jury known to the Constitution as such, a jury, if you please, of five impartial men, then we have not only done the best we can, but we have fulfilled the obligation of the Constitution of the United States.

I am fully aware of the position which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has taken heretofore on this subject. I am fully aware that he believes—and of course I do not desire to misstate him—that all this jurisdiction is assumed and exercised by the Government of the United States outside of the Constitution and without a warrant expressly given in it; but I prefer to keep myself a little closer in to shore; I prefer to believe that it is possible to exercise this jurisdiction in conformity with the principles and provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and believing that, I think it is our bounden duty, while we conform to the principles and provisions of the Constitution, and in no instance violate them, that we should go as far as it is possible and under all existing conditions to extend them to those communities.

I do not believe, at least I do not for the present purpose of the argument I have now with the Senator from Kansas, that this jurisdiction is exercised outside of the Constitution. I believe that it is exercised within it. I believe that under the Constitution you may have a jury which does not consist of twelve men. I believe you may have a jury which does not consist of citizens of the United States. Believing that there is no inhibition upon juries of that kind, I maintain that we have fulfilled the provisions of the Constitution when we provide that these courts shall impanel a jury of five. That only takes a less advanced position than the Senator from Massachusetts is waiting to take, who believes that citizens of the United States can be tried without a jury, without indictment, without presentment by a grand jury, and without the guards provided by the clause in the Constitution which the Senator from Kansas has read.

That answers, Mr. President, so far as I remember, the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to disclaim the opinion which the Senator from Ohio has imputed to me, that these trials are without the Constitution. I think they are very clearly within the Constitution of the United States. That the Constitution of the United States applies to offenses committed in China against the Chinese law, that it extends the methods of proceeding which it provides for offenses committed on our own soil against American law, I do not believe; and I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if he does not agree that offenses committed on shipboard may be constitutionally tried by the Government of the United States, although certainly they are not tried in the State or district where the offense was committed nor in any district previously ascertained by law?

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the Senator mean other offenses than those provided for in the clause which gives jurisdiction over piracies and felonies on the high seas?

Mr. HOAR. I mean all offenses on shipboard.

Mr. PENDLETON. Wherever the ship may be?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is another question. This answers, Mr. President, as far as I propose to do at this moment, what the Senator from Kansas has said in reference to the constitution of the juries. I say very frankly that I would prefer to constitute the juries in these countries as they are ordinarily constituted within the limits of the United States; but that is a matter of preference; that is a matter of taste; that is a method which I should think it wise for us to follow provided it could be done, but I again repeat that I deny that a jury must be constituted of twelve men or constituted of citizens of the United States.

I do not remember what other objection the Senator from Kansas named besides the constitution of the jury.

Mr. INGALLS. I mentioned nothing else but that.

Mr. PENDLETON. Now, sir, we find ourselves confronted with this dilemma: If there is no authority in the Constitution of the United States to exercise judicial powers outside of the limits of the territory of the United States, then we must commit our citizens to the jurisdiction of the native tribunals and laws. This is the alternative before us—either to find power somewhere to erect these tribunals for the administration of civil and criminal law under the authority of the United States or to commit our citizens to the administration of the local law by the native tribunals. The alternative to passing a bill of this kind—I do not say this bill with these specific provisions without amendment—is to submit hereafter to the enormities, as I venture to call them, of our own penal and civil codes which are now enforced in the administration of the courts within those countries.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think it will be conceded that there are more subjects of Great Britain in China and Japan than we have citizens there, at least in China; and I would ask the Senator what system she has adopted in reference to matters of this kind, and so of the other great nations of the continent whose relations with these countries are even more intimate than our own?

Mr. PENDLETON. The British system of the administration of law under treaties somewhat similar, if not exactly similar, to ours is very much more elaborate and intricate than the system provided in this bill. They have extended the trial by jury to these countries; they have done everything they could within the last thirty or forty years to improve the system which existed at the time when our consular-court system was first adopted, in 1848. They have provided for juries of five and for appeals to their higher courts, very much as is done by this bill. They have taken away from their consuls in many if not in all these countries all judicial functions, and have provided judges, whose duty it shall be not to attend to commercial affairs at all, but to attend to the administration of the law and judicially sit in judgment upon their citizens. They have imported all the ameliorations that were possible from the humane and wise system of the administration of the criminal and civil laws which has existed for many years in England and which are being introduced every year. The French Government has done the same thing. It has made amelioration of the imperfect provisions of their system, imperfect, but sufficient perhaps for the population fifty or eighty years ago in these countries. They have improved these systems, I say, and suited them to a population numbering thousands and thousands in many of the countries and ports. This is an honest attempt on the part of the Congress of the United States to introduce some of these improvements into our very rude and barbarous consular-court system, in order to make it conform more to our notions of the proper administration of justice as we find it in our own country, in order that when our citizens leave their homes they shall not leave also all the protections of life and property to which they have been accustomed here.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the question of the power to pass bills of this character, after considerable reflection since the bill was read yesterday, seems to me to rest entirely on the treaty-making power or on the authority which grows out of the treaty-making power under article 2 of the Constitution. It can not come from the commercial power, because without a treaty we could do nothing in the way of commercial regulations abroad in the territory of foreign countries. So whatever authority you look at under the Constitution the power to pass such a bill as this must, in my judgment, rest on the power to make treaties. In other words, the jurisdiction that we have in China or Japan is just exactly what those people may have given us and no more. We get it by a treaty with them. It is something like the power of passing laws for extradition. In the very early history of this Government the State of Vermont objected to the power of Congress to pass extradition laws, and attempted to withhold by her State officers a person who was arrested as a criminal under the extradition laws of the United States. I refer to the case of Holmes vs. Jackson in 14 Peters, which came to the Supreme Court of the United States. Holmes was ordered by the governor of Vermont to be surrendered to the authorities of Quebec, and on habeas corpus by the supreme court of Vermont he was not discharged, and the proceeding was claimed to be under State law and State authority. But the Supreme Court of the United States, the opinion being delivered by Judge Taney, held that it was not by virtue of any State law that this could be done, but it was only national authority under the power to make treaties with foreign powers under article 2 of the Constitution, and that where such treaties had been made and a law passed in pursuance thereof the national jurisdiction took charge of the person instead of the State jurisdiction. That has been standard authority from that day to this. It has been affirmed and reaffirmed repeatedly.

As I understood the Senator from Ohio in answer to a question propounded to him by the Senator from Wisconsin, we have treaties with these powers stipulating for these things and probably other things. If we have or if we should have, then this power is conceded to us. We go into those jurisdictions with just what they have given to us and with full power to execute it there, the Constitution not being in force there as in the territory of the United States, but we act under such laws as we choose to make in carrying out the jurisdiction granted to us by these foreign powers.

The Senator from Massachusetts has indicated a class of cases, the trial of persons who commit crimes on the high seas, that by analogy come under this same power or authority. It is not a question of enforcing a constitutional provision within the territory of this Government; but it is a question of enforcing rights and obligations in a foreign territory conceded to us by treaty, which the President has authority to make under article 2 of the Constitution, two-thirds of the Senate concurring. That, I think, is the whole case; and whether we take five jurors or three or no jurors at all, it is permissible for us to do it, because we are exercising a jurisdiction there given to us by the treaty-making power.

If Senators will examine consular courts already established they will find that even that law gives power and authority and jurisdiction to our consuls that no one man could exercise constitutionally in the territory of this country. Consuls alone are made courts for many purposes; they are made courts for many purposes for which upon the territory of the United States we employ jurors, twelve men, good and lawful men of the bailiwick. These consuls exercise many powers of that sort, such as levying large fines and arresting persons and depriving them of liberty and confining them, because we there exercise authority that is given us by the foreign power under the authority granted by the Constitution to make treaties. So much for that.

There is one difficulty in my mind about this bill. The Senator from Ohio states for example that we take five jurors because we can not get twelve. Is not this, then, too much machinery? Is not this too complicated a system? Is not this too unwieldy a piece of business for the small amount really that is at stake or for the small object in view in organizing this cumbrous and unwieldy machinery?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not know that the Senator from Arkansas quite understood me or whether I expressed myself clearly. The provisions of this bill are that juries shall consist of five men. There is no attempt under the provisions of the bill to secure a jury of twelve men. The juries are limited to five in the bill because of the difficulty which is known to exist of getting juries of twelve men in many of these places. In places provided for in this bill the jury is to consist of five only.

Mr. GARLAND. That is not precisely as I understood the Senator. I must have misunderstood him. But it illustrates the point I have in my mind, that it occurs to me that we are establishing too large an organization, too big a system, too unwieldy a system for the object in view. Of course as the committee, as I understand, had this under examination for a long time and gave it constant and serious attention, I should dislike to oppose anything they have done; but it does seem to me, conceding the power under the Constitution, as I attempted to show, to do this with the consent of the foreign nation, that this is too big a machine for the business in view. Still I have no amendment to offer and no suggestion beyond this to make. That we can do this I have convinced myself on examination of the statutes in connection with the Constitution and the decisions of the court. Of that there is no doubt in my mind.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will examine somewhat the code of practice which is in force in the consular courts under a provision of the Revised Statutes, and which comprises nine-tenths of the book that I hold in my hand, he will find a complicated system, enormous in extent, without harmony anywhere, in comparison with which the provisions of this bill are simplicity itself; and this complicated system of existing law is put in force at the sole will of the ministers in the respective countries under the provision of the Revised Statutes, which by this bill is repealed.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Ohio, before he takes his seat, a question? My mind runs rather to the practical working of the bill than to its constitutionality, although that is a very interesting question. I wish to know what is the necessity for the exercise of this extraordinary power, as it has been properly characterized. The question I wish the Senator to answer is: What has been the abuse under the present system? What are the defects of the present system? Have they been of a character to justify legislation of the description here proposed, which may be deemed by some to go even to the verge of unconstitutionality? Is this legislation necessary (supposing it to be constitutional) in order that we may have safety and justice on the part of our courts in the Eastern countries?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I do not think that I can be accused of a spirit of opposition to a measure of this kind, for I remember a year or two ago there was a very interesting debate in the Senate on the subject, when my distinguished friend from Ohio made a motion to strike out of an appropriation bill a sum of money to pay for these consular courts. I remember that debate; and I remember very distinctly that I was one who admitted to the fullest extent possible the right of any foreign sovereign to concede to the representative of another sovereign the power to try one of the latter's subjects for an infraction of the laws of the foreign country. And when the late Senator from Wisconsin, who was always so able and clear upon topics of that kind, contended, as did the then Senator from New York, who was so highly distinguished in this body, Mr. Conkling, that such trials were contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and that our citizen in these foreign countries was entitled to the protection of the safeguards of our organic law, I dissented, as I now do, from that entire doctrine. I do not think that the Constitution of the United States has any extraterritorial operation. I do not think that it ever was created to confer powers upon us to legislate for any foreign country; and that when it comes to the exercise of these powers relating to foreign countries and intercourse with them we are confined to the provisions of the organic law.

Now, I can very readily see how this system could be made to work very well, and at the same time I can see in it enough that might lead to terrible complications of jurisdiction. We know, after an experience of nearly a century under our own Government, how difficult it has been to draw the line between the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the States, and nearly every controversy of a serious character that has arisen under our system has grown out of the difficulty of marking distinctly the lines of jurisdiction which separate the authority of the Union from the authority of the States.

When you undertake to establish in a country like China or Japan a judicial system like this, with a code of laws provided as herein, with judges created by yourselves, who can tell the moment that you will be brought face to face with those domestic tribunals and jurisdictions, and international complications of a serious character arise? If you simply give to a consul the power, as I understood was the form of the law formerly, to administer the foreign law for the benefit of your own citizen, that is one thing, and I believe that is about as far as we have ever gone in that direction hitherto.

I appreciate the effort the Senator from Ohio is making to remedy difficulties that may now exist, but I say the usage of nations in such cases is that the foreign officer should do nothing more than administer the foreign law that has been violated by his own citizens; and when you undertake to establish a code of laws, as this bill does, under the municipal authority of your own Government, and put them in operation within the confines of another state, you may possibly at some time have a clash of jurisdiction.

I understand the provisions of this bill in some respects to extend to cases where a Chinese and an American citizen are involved in controversy—admiralty, equity, civil jurisdiction—and it will be readily seen how a conflict between a domestic subject there might arise against an American citizen. But I do not say this except with the view of showing that this subject is very full of complications.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I interrupt the Senator from Florida to correct a misapprehension that I think he is under in respect to the previous practice under treaties with China and Japan for instance, and very likely other nations? I think he will find on looking at the treaties that the arrangement has always been in substance that the citizen or subject of the other country in a controversy, either criminal or civil, should be tried in mixed courts or in the consular courts on the principles of the law of his own country. If, therefore, a Chinese subject had done a wrong to an American citizen, the Chinese subject was to be adjudged, although tried in the same courts, according to the Chinese law; if the American was accused of doing any wrong he was to be tried on the principles of the American law. But all that has been conventional, just as this bill is really exerting a power under the authority of the sovereign dominion of the country where it is to be exercised, because that sovereign dominion is just as great in China or Japan as it is in the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That I admit. I have not examined the treaties to see how far the concessions have extended, but then I do not subscribe to the doctrine laid down by my friend from Arkansas a while ago that under a government like ours we are at liberty to exercise every power that may be conceded to us by a foreign country in a treaty. I say that the limitations attending the exercise of our power must not be looked for in the concessions of a foreign power. If you undertook to do that you might extend the powers of this Government all over the globe and do things beyond the confines of the Union which you would not be permitted to do here. When it comes to the concession of the right to try an American citizen who has violated a foreign law before a consul in one of these barbarous countries I think it is a wise thing to do, and I said that in my place when objection was made to it, I think by my distinguished friend from Ohio because it did not go far enough, I think he thought, in throwing around that citizen the benefit of trial by jury and all those constitutional safeguards that we find in our own Constitution. I think I said on that occasion, as I say now, that when a citizen goes abroad to any country he has no right to claim that the Constitution of his country shall follow him.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask one thing here? I submit to my friend from Ohio whether, so far from this act of Congress constituting a curtailment of the constitutional rights or other rights of American citizenship, it does not in point of fact enlarge them to the degree that the law extends over such rights as he would have by the permission of the foreign nation? In other words, it is just so much granted in addition to what we have under the admitted rules of international law. So far from having his liberty abridged or the right of protection denied, this international code—for that is what it is—simply gives him that which but for that code he would be absolutely deprived of.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, it was said by a great lawgiver that the forms of law are the repositories of its grandest principles. I believe a good deal in the forms of law, and when you go out of them it will always have a bad effect upon the public mind.

I confess on reading this bill at first I was struck with the unusual character of its provisions; and still after the very elaborate and clear statement made by the Senator from Ohio much of my prejudice to it was removed; but when I first looked at section 12, wherein it is provided that district judges of the United States for Japan and China shall be appointed and that judicial districts shall be carved out of the territory of those countries for all judicial purposes, it seemed to me that this was going a little beyond the usual consular and diplomatic line. It looked to me that under whatever power it might be claimed it was the exercise of the municipal authority of one country within the confines of another, and the doubt in my mind has been whether, admitting all that has been said touching the power given by the treaties with Japan and China, those countries can empower us to exercise municipal authority within their boundaries. That is the point. I do not question for a moment the right of those countries to permit our consuls to take jurisdiction over offenders there who may violate the foreign laws; but when in a treaty it is conceded that the United States may legislate over that territory which forms a distinct and integral foreign soil, whether under the limitations of the power contained in our organic law we can do that thing is a question in my mind. That this bill does that I do not think there can be any question, because it institutes a code of laws to be applied in foreign territory. I have said repeatedly on this subject the Constitution of the United States was made for our own country, and we are not in the position of those powers of Europe who have no defined authority, who can do anything they please in foreign lands on questions of this kind. But whether the legislative power of the United States—I do not speak of the treaty-making power—is not necessarily a constitutional power, confined to our own territory, is the fundamental question, and whether we have any right to legislate for Japan or China even though those countries may say that we may.

What is the character of our power? Suppose, according to the argument of my distinguished friend from Arkansas, Mexico to-morrow should make a treaty and say, "We want you to legislate for this whole country on everything; we are utterly unable to provide for our own people; yours are mixed up with ours, and we will give you jurisdiction under the treaty to legislate for us and institute courts of law, courts of equity, and common law and criminal law;" the question is whether under the exercise of the legislative power of the United States that authority could be exerted.

I merely throw out this, not by way of opposition to the bill, because, as I indicated in the debate before when others were opposed to any consular trials at all, I advocated them and admitted that it was fully competent for consuls to try American citizens who had violated the law.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my colleague allow me to ask the action of the Senate on a bill returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment?

Mr. PENDLETON. For reference?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; to concur in the amendment. It will only take a moment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield for an instant.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any Senator objects I will not ask it. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to act on a House amendment to a Senate joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the Chair at this time lay before the Senate Senate joint resolution No. 64 providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate. Is there objection to the Chair laying the resolution before the Senate at this time?

Mr. PENDLETON. If the consideration of the amendment will lead to debate, I shall have to object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not press it if there is a single objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Chair laying the resolution before the Senate at this time? The Chair hears none. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to add to the joint resolution:

Which sum shall be available only for the expenses of investigations heretofore ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. What do I understand to be the object of the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To move to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the resolution at this time?

Mr. BUTLER. My reason for objecting is that a qualification is attached which I do not think the House has any right to put upon it. I do not object to the $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina object to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the matter must go over.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. JONAS. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], I would ask consent to take from the table a House bill for the purpose of reference to a committee which meets to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Chair laying before the Senate at this time the House bill referred to by the Senator from Louisiana? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel of South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONAS. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL JURISDICTION OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] has stated substantially the position that he occupied two or three years ago in debate on this subject, although he did not then limit quite so closely as he does now the power of the Government to establish tribunals for the trial of citizens. He seems now to limit the authority of the Government of the United States to try before consular and other courts, certainly consular courts, citizens of the United States for infractions of the law of the foreign country in which they are, and that there is no power on the part of the Government to pass laws, or municipal regulations as he chooses to call them, upon other subjects.

My honorable friend, if he will look to the practice which has prevailed for forty years, more or less—thirty-eight, to be exact—will find that the practice has been that these courts administer the whole body of law made under the authority of the Government of the United States, and that they have not confined their jurisdiction to the trial of offenses against the laws of the country in which these courts were situated. If he will look—and I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to this public document that I have in my hand—he will find that, under the authority of section 4086 of the Revised Statutes, here is a code of laws established by the minister to China, comprising nearly fifty pages of this volume. Here is another code established by the minister or consul-general to the Ottoman dominions, comprising a very large number of pages of this volume. He will find also a code of laws for Japan, which comprises over forty pages of this volume.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the Senator say the minister made the laws?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir; and I am proceeding to answer the question which the Senator put to me in relation to the necessity of this measure. I wish to call his attention to section 4086 of the Revised Statutes—

But in all cases where such laws are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, the common law and the law of equity and admiralty shall be extended in like manner over such citizens and others in those countries; and if neither the common law, nor the law of equity or admiralty, nor the statutes of the United States, furnish appropriate and sufficient remedies, the ministers in those countries, respectively, shall, by decrees and regulations which shall have the force of law, supply such defects and deficiencies.

Under that clause of the Revised Statutes this volume of laws and of regulations in each of these countries have been adopted and promulgated by the ministers to those countries; and under the clause of the Revised Statutes they have the force and effect of laws.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand that that power is also given to the consular agents or do they exercise that power?

Mr. PENDLETON. The ministers.

Mr. MCPHERSON. But suppose there is no minister resident in the country, then the qustion is, do the consular agents have the power?

Mr. PENDLETON. The consul-general has the power.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then, if I understand aright, they not only have the power to make laws in addition to those already upon our statute-book, but they have the exclusive power of administering and executing and interpreting their own laws.

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir; you have it exactly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That is extraordinary.

Mr. PENDLETON. You have it exactly; and in a communication made by the Secretary of State he says—I adopt his language:

This brings me naturally to a fourth consideration, in regard to the codification of the enactments themselves pertaining to consular jurisdiction. Sections 4083 to 4130 of the Revised Statutes are a rearrangement and continuous compilation of the laws on the subject since 1860. The result is, unfortunately, to render the statute ill-digested, disconnected in its parts, and obscure as a whole. Intended for the guidance of officers not as a rule versed in jurisprudence, it would seem that the utmost clearness and precision would have been sought, with distinct definitions of their powers and duties. In practice, however, an examination of the questions of interpretation referred to the Department of State by our diplomatic and consular officers shows a latitude of construction and a diversity of conclusions not entirely unwarranted by the text of the law. All, however, agree in the complete liberty of the officer conducting a criminal or civil proceeding to decide within his own discretion touching the assistance of assessors, the admissibility of testimony, the rehearing of the parties, the granting of new trials, the exercise of the right of appeal, and, in a word, nearly every matter pertaining to his own administration of the law.

And thereupon——

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the bill reported by the Senator limit the courts which the bill proposes to establish to the laws of the United States found on the statute-book?

Mr. PENDLETON. To the laws of the United States, and the common law, and a code of laws hereafter to be prepared under the authority of the President and submitted to Congress for its enactment. Now, sir, in relation to the administration of the criminal law:

I regard a reform in this sense as especially indispensable in capital cases. As at present organized, doubts must arise in the mind of every constitutional jurist touching the power of a consular court, or rather of a minister or consul acting judicially under the authority of Congress, to legally and constitutionally deprive a fellow-being of life. Since the existing statute was framed in 1848 and modified and extended in 1860 at least seven capital convictions have occurred thereunder, all in China and Japan. These instances are worthy of note, especially as in one of them actual execution of the sentence followed.

First. David Williams, claiming to be a British subject, was, in November, 1863, at Shanghai, convicted by Consul-General Seward, acting judicially with assessors, of "piracy and murder," in the robbery of a Chinese craft on the Yangtse. The sentence was approved by the secretary of legation, acting as minister, and a death-warrant signed by him. A few hours before the time fixed for execution Williams committed suicide in the consular jail.

Second. James White was in like manner convicted of murder by the consular court at Shanghai November 23, 1863. Mr. Burlingame, the minister, issued a warrant for the execution, but before the sentence could be carried out White escaped from jail and was not recaptured.

Third. John D. Buckley, claiming to be a British subject, was in like manner convicted of murder by the consular court at Shanghai on the 1st of February, 1864. His cause was ably defended by his counsel, Mr. J. B. Eames, who argued the unconstitutionality of a trial without indictment or jury.

The minister, Mr. Burlingame, approved the sentence of the consular court and issued a warrant of execution. Writing to the Department of State, Mr. Burlingame said, June 3, 1864, "A vigorous effort was made by Mr. Eames, the counsel of the prisoner, to secure a reference to the President, but I could not see my way clear to grant his request;" thus giving the prosecution and not the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. Buckley was hanged at the United States consulate on April 1, 1864.

There are other cases:

Fourth. James Webb, an American seaman, was, in December, 1878, by the consular court at Nagasaki, Japan, convicted of murder. * * * My predecessor, Mr. Secretary Evarts, found himself confronted by the question of the constitutionality of a death sentence without indictment and trial by jury, and the President was counseled by him and by the Attorney-General to exert his prerogative of clemency. Webb's sentence was accordingly commuted to that of imprisonment for life.

Fifth. Before the consular court at Osaka and Hiogo, Japan, on the 9th of April, 1880—

As late as that—

William Dinkelle, an American citizen and seaman, was convicted of murder on shipboard in the port of Hiogo. The minister, Mr. Bingham, withheld the issuance of a death-warrant, and referred the case, with recommendation of clemency, to the President, who remitted Dinkelle's sentence on condition of undergoing imprisonment for life. Dinkelle refused to accept this conditional pardon, and is still in jail under indefinite postponement of the execution of the sentence of the consular court.

I submit to the Senator from New Jersey whether I have not made out the fact that as to the administration of both the criminal and the civil law under the present consular code there is the greatest possible necessity for amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Anything seems an improvement.

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir, anything is an improvement.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. CALL. I will, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. POLAND. I reported a bill yesterday morning from the Committee on the Judiciary for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I think it should have gone to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, too, after ascertaining the contents of the bill. If there be no objection the bill will be taken from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and placed on the Private Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

UNDERVALUATION OF IMPORTED WOOL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, making additional statements concerning alleged undervaluation of imported wool; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting letters from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, suspending certain items in the accounts of disbursing officers of the Interior Department for the Freedman's Hospital and Asylum of Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING ADDITIONAL COPIES OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER, in pursuance of the statute, laid before the House the following concurrent resolutions of the Senate; which were referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the National Academy of Sciences, with its appendixes, be printed in the usual octavo form, but that the four accompanying memoirs be printed in quarto form; and that 1,000 additional copies of the report and memoirs be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Academy of Sciences.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 extra copies of the report of Julius E. EXAMINATION AND SURVEY OF SOUTH PASS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, ETC.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to bring to the attention of the House at this time a matter of emergency, and to ask that House bill No. 5462 to be taken from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union and considered now. I ask one moment to make an explanation of the measure. This bill is a deficiency appropriation of $8,100, specially asked for by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to debate the proposition until the House has determined whether it will consider it at this time or not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire a word of explanation before objection is asked for.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The title of the bill, which was read, is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read, and that it be now considered in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which, if there be no objection, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] will be allowed to make a brief explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. If I am correctly informed, the passage of this bill immediately will save the Government a large sum of money.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is the explanation which I desire to make.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to wit:

To supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examinations and surveys required by the acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time by James B. Eads at South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report to Congress during the maintenance of the work, $6,000.

To supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for gauging waters of lower Mississippi and its tributaries: For annual expense of gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, continuing observations of the rise and fall of the river and its chief tributaries, as required by joint resolution of February 21, 1871, $2,100.

SEC. 2. That the moneys hereby appropriated shall be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. REED. What is the total amount involved in the bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is $8,100.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] asks leave to make a brief statement, subject to the right of members to object to the consideration of the bill after his statement is concluded.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. By the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, and the act of June 19, 1878, it is made the duty of the Secretary of War to have annually made at the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi River certain surveys and examinations, with a view of determining whether or not Captain Eads is carrying out his contract with the Government and also with a view of enabling the Government to ascertain whether said Eads has or has not earned his compensation under such contract.

This matter has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by the Secretary of War in a special communication, and also by the Chief of Engineers, who has appeared before us. We were given to understand that if this deficiency appropriation be not made at this time the Secretary of War will not be able to discharge the duty imposed upon him by existing law; will not know whether to meet the payments provided for in the contract with Captain Eads at the time when they fall due. We are further informed by the counsel of Captain Eads, who appeared before the committee, that unless this appropriation be made, so as to provide for these surveys and examinations, Captain Eads, under his contract, will have the right to demand payment in bonds of the Government, instead of currency. Bonds are worth about 20 per cent. premium. Therefore the passage of this bill will save to the Government a large amount of money.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] whether it is not necessary to make this appropriation now, in order to give the War Department sufficient time to make its surveys to ascertain whether Captain Eads has earned this money or not?

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is the fact.

Mr. RANDALL. If he has earned the money he gets it; otherwise not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this appropriation recommended by the Secretary of War?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is.

Mr. DUNN. Is the passage of this bill necessary in consequence of the failure of the last river and harbor bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is. These appropriations have heretofore been made in the river and harbor bill; but at the last session of the last Congress that bill failed; hence the necessity for this deficiency appropriation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Had we not better pass the bill and quit talking about it? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think so.

Mr. DUNN. We want to know who is responsible.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Louisiana that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be brought before the House for action. If there be no objection that order will be considered as made.

There was no objection.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. RANDALL. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, I report back the joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate. I propose, when the resolution and accompanying report have been read, to ask the previous question.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the Senate for expenses of special and select committees for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report of the Committee on Appropriations accompanying the joint resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the Senate joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate, report the same back to the House with a recommendation that the same pass with an amendment as follows:

At the end of the last line of said joint resolution insert the following: "Which sum shall be available only for the expenses of investigations heretofore ordered."

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the previous question on the amendment and upon ordering the joint resolution to a third reading.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to; and the joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading.

The joint resolution was read a third time, and passed; there being—ayes 116, noes 12.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY OVERFLOW AND CYCLONE.

Mr. ELLIS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back adversely joint resolutions of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 162) making an appropriation for the relief of sufferers by overflow in the lower Mississippi Valley and the rivers tributary thereto;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 180) for the relief of sufferers by the late cyclone in North Carolina; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 183) making an appropriation for the relief of persons rendered destitute by the overflow of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY FLOODS.

Mr. ELLIS. Acting under instructions of the Committee on Appropriations, I present a resolution, which is offered in lieu of several referred to that committee, and I ask it be read for present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House from time to time with information of the progress of the flood in the valley of the Mississippi, and to report if at any time in his judgment there exists such suffering in consequence of said floods as to justify measures of relief on the part of Congress, and if so the measure of such relief.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ORDERED TO BE PRINTED.

Mr. RYAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell, a Representative-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress from the State of Kansas, 12,500 copies, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives. And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Dudley C. Haskell to accompany said eulogies, and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SWINE PRODUCTS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am requested by the Committee on Agriculture to ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk may be considered at this time.

Mr. CLAY. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Before we go to the regular order of business I have a privileged report to submit.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask to introduce a joint resolution from the Committee on Agriculture, and if its consideration be objected to at this time I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Printing. If the gentleman from Kentucky had waited until the resolution was read I am sure he would not have objected to it.

Mr. CLAY. I thought it was time we should proceed to the consideration of the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CLAY. I do not object to the resolution, for I do not know what it is, as it has not been read, but I must insist upon the regular order of business. I do not object to its being introduced for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported joint resolution (H. Res. 192) for the printing of extra copies of documents concerning swine products of this country; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 60,000 copies of the report of the Secretary of State and accompanying report made by the commission lately designated by the President to examine and report upon the asserted unhealthfulness of the swine products of this country, together with the message of the President transmitting the same to the House of Representatives; 45,000 copies thereof for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, 10,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 copies thereof for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—NEW MEXICO.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the following unanimous report:

Francisco A. Manzanares, contestant, vs. Tranquilino Luna, contestee, from the Territory of New Mexico.

Your committee, to whom was referred the above case, beg leave to report:

That on the 29th day of November, 1882, the acting governor of the Territory of New Mexico issued his certificate of election in due form to the sitting Delegate. That on the 23d day of December, 1882, the contestant served a copy of his notice of contest on the wife of the contestee at his residence in the Territory of New Mexico, the contestee not being found at home. That on the 20th day of December, 1882, the contestant sent a copy of his said notice of contest by express to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States to be served on contestee, and on the same day sent by mail, by a registered letter, another copy addressed to contestee, directed to the city of Washington, where contestee was then in attendance upon the session of Congress.

That contestee answered in full on the 29th day of January, 1883.

The contestee claimed that the notice was not served in time; but your committee are of opinion that the notice was ample and served in time and in accordance with the statute law of New Mexico; and for the further reasons that the sheriff who served the notice of contest upon contestee's wife testified contestee was absent from the Territory of New Mexico, and, besides, he mailed a registered letter containing notice of contest to contestee at the city of Washington, where contestee was, and that the letter reached the city within the time prescribed by law for the notice to be served.

The notice of contest charges fraud in various counties in the Territory; the answer denies each charge specifically and makes counter-charges. The contestant only took testimony in one county, Valencia, in regard to nineteen precincts in that county and one precinct in Socorro County; the contestee took no testimony, but appeared by counsel at each sitting of the taking of depositions, and in most every instance cross-examined the witnesses.

Every voting precinct in the Territory of New Mexico, in each county, is known by its number.

In the county of Valencia your committee think it is clearly proven that frauds were committed in several of the precincts, and were such as to compel your committee to throw out the whole vote of said precincts; the fraud being so great and the returns so entirely in disregard of law and fair conduct on the part of the election officers that it is impossible to separate the good from the bad vote.

Before going into any detail of the evidence your committee will state that the census of 1880 shows the whole number of male adults capable of voting in that county to be 2,636, while the vote certified and counted for contestee is 4,193. Moreover, while the certificate from that county gave the contestee that remarkable vote, it did not give even one to the contestant, although the returns before them showed he had received 66 votes. Your committee deem it appropriate to refer the House to the vote for Delegate in Congress of the two political parties in this Territory from 1873 to 1882 inclusive, which is as follows, to wit:

Aggregate vote:

1882	4,259

See certified returns.

We will now give the Democratic vote received in that county for each of the years just named:

1873	629
1882, none certified or counted, but the addition shows	66

It will thus be seen that the vote of 1882 was 4,259, while the largest vote ever polled before in that county was 2,136. It will moreover appear that during the period referred to, to wit, from 1873 to 1882, the Democratic candidates received the votes as above set forth, and at this election the poll-books showed he received 66, but the county board certified him none. These are very pregnant evidences of fraud taken in connection with the evidence, which shows no increase of population from 1880 to 1882.

Your committee will now proceed to notice several of the precincts wherein they think the fraud was such that the pretended vote of each must be thrown out. These are referred to as a fair sample of the rest.

Precinct No. 2.—At this precinct there were counted and certified for contestee 349 votes; for contestant 3. The evidence shows that there were only 121 votes cast, and the remainder were fictitious names placed on the poll-books by the officers of the election.

Precinct No. 3.—There were 381 votes counted for contestee, while the evidence shows only 160 votes were cast; the balance were fictitious.

Precinct No. 4.—Seventy votes for contestee and none for contestant. The evidence shows that after the polls were closed the ballot-box was not opened, the votes were not counted, but ballot-box, tally-sheets, registration-list, and all were sent to the county seat in that condition, nothing certified.

Precinct No. 10.—The vote certified for contestee was 295, when the evidence shows that only 84 votes were cast at that precinct.

Precinct No. 11.—There appear 387 votes certified for contestee, and evidence shows that only about 55 votes were actually cast.

Precinct No. 1.—Vote certified for contestee 443, none for contestant; this precinct is the home of contestee, and the only evidence of fraud is the voters' names being recorded in the poll-books to a great extent alphabetically, as if copied from some index or registration-list.

Precinct No. 14.—The vote counted and certified for contestee was 161, and evidence shows total vote polled at that precinct to be 40.

Your committee deem it unnecessary to follow the facts in each particular precinct: suffice to say that they vary but little from those given. It will be seen by reference to the evidence that in many places the names of those pretended to have voted are wholly fictitious or of persons long since dead, of eminent American statesmen who have been dead many years; the name of Frank James, the notorious bandit, is found recorded as voting at one of the precincts of Valencia County.

It will also appear that at some precincts the whole reported vote was a forgery, there being no such persons as the pretended judges, clerks, or voters.

There is also one precinct in Socorro County, adjoining Valencia County, where the pretended poll was taken on Monday, the 6th, instead of the 7th of November.

Your committee make the following summary:

Whole vote in the Territory for Congress as certified by the returning boards.

Counties.	Luna.	Manzanares.
Valencia	4,193	66

From which deduct the fraudulent votes as per evidence, which are found to be 2,357; and under this state of facts, giving the contestee the benefit of the doubtful and actual votes cast in Valencia County, namely, 1,836, we submit the following statement, to wit:

Whole number of votes returned for contestant as per certified copies of returns of each county	13,225
Whole number of votes returned for contestee as per certified copies of returns of each county	14,644
From which subtract the illegal and fraudulent vote, as above	2,357
Leaves the vote of contestee	12,287
Showing majority for contestant	938

Therefore your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Tranquilino Luna was not elected a Delegate to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Territory of New Mexico, and is not entitled to the seat he now holds.

Resolved, That Francisco A. Manzanares was duly elected a Delegate to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Territory of New Mexico, and is entitled to be sworn in as such.

The report was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRANCISCO A. MANZANARES then appeared at the Speaker's desk and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1756 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole to further consider the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask the gentleman to withhold his motion long enough for me to ask the reference of a bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Very well.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 4971, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and that the same, with said amendments, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I now renew my motion to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 48.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS, from Committee on the Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for so much of H. R. 292 as refers to the forfeiture of the land grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, a bill (H. R. 1682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, declaring the forfeiture of the lands granted therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. OATES. I desire, Mr. Speaker, permission to file the report of the minority in connection with the bill just reported from the Committee on Public Lands. I will file the report during the day, not having had an opportunity of conferring with other gentlemen on the committee who may wish to sign it.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the gentleman from Alabama will have permission to file the minority report during the day.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, in lieu of House bills 485, 742, 1082, 1055, and 1058, a bill (H. R. 5683) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the other bills will be laid on the table under the rule.

GEORGE J. STANNARD.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 2839) to increase the pension of George J. Stannard, late a major-general of volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT CARRICK.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 1536) for the relief of Robert Carrick; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

TELEGRAPH OPERATORS DURING THE WAR.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported, in lieu of House bills 145 and 246, a bill (H. R. 5684) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bills 145 and 246, having the same title, were laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY ANN KING.

Mr. ROSECRANS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 1595) for the relief of Mary Ann King, mother of Andrew King, deceased, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

The motion was agreed to.

BOYS ENLISTED IN THE NAVY.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending that the number of boys to be enlisted in the Navy be increased from 750 to 1,000, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

TRAINING SHIPS.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, also reported back a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in reference to building two new training ships, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CEMETERY SITE AT KIRWIN, KANS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 577) to donate a cemetery site on the public lands to the city of Kirwin, in the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes. The question pending is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr McMILLIN], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment adopted, at the end of line 38, the following: "That the number of captains shall be reduced to thirty, and the number of commanders be reduced to fifty, and no more promotions shall be made to these grades until the numbers are reduced below the numbers herein mentioned."

The CHAIRMAN. The House has limited debate on the pending clause of the bill and amendments thereto to fifteen minutes. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] in charge of the bill.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield five minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. If I understand, Mr. Chairman, the scope of the amendment of my friend from Tennessee, it is to cut down the number of supernumeraries now in our Navy. At least it has that effect to some extent. In that connection I desire to call the attention of the committee to a statement which is veritable as to the number of naval officers who have been around Washington city since 1868. My colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], has already told the House how many are on sea-service, how many are on land-service, how many are waiting orders. He obtained this information from official sources. He showed to this House that there was a great need of cutting down this enormous surplusage.

But look at the number of these naval officers around Washington city. In the year 1868, of the line there were 20, of staff officers 42; a total of 62. In the year 1870 there were line officers 57, staff officers 46; a total of 103. In 1872 there were 47 line officers and 45 staff officers; a total of 92. In 1875 there were 47 line officers and 44 staff officers; a total of 91. In 1882 there were 91 line officers and 53 staff officers; a total of 144. Last year, 1883, we had 113 line officers and 56 staff officers, making a total of 169 as the number of officers on duty in Washington city; showing an increase since 1868 that is perfectly enormous.

No man can justify the keeping up of this great service without at the same time increasing the force of our ironclads or our cruisers. There we may take issue. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. KASSON, I think it was, made a strong speech here, in which he said he believed every man who knew anything of the history of mankind of late years believed there were only two ways of either keeping the peace or making war—Blut und Eisen, as he called it, which, translated into the vernacular, means, I suppose, blood and iron. And yet, at the same time, the gentleman sneered at the conduct of the Democracy on this bill. Why, sir, the gentleman refers to Bismarck, the grand vizier of German tyranny, the man who insults republics, and the gentleman quotes him here as our model. I thought the Republican party of late years were recommending the amicabilia of arbitration as the way of settling disputes among nations.

And now, instead of treaties, instead of commissions, instead of amicable modes, we are commended by the elegant gentleman from Iowa, by the elegant diplomat who was once in Germany, to the mode of blood and iron. The gentleman from Iowa postpones the millennium, which was intended to usher in another and a somewhat better era, for the era of blood and iron, not the era of civilization, when better days shall dawn for mankind.

Gentlemen on the other side have reproached our side of the House because we do not at once vote their additional seven cruisers; yet for ten years of legislative life they themselves failed to do so. The Forty-seventh Congress never touched the matter, except to begin the construction of four cruisers, and we are following out that policy thus far. During the ten years when gentlemen of the other side had power here they did not do anything to enhance or improve the Navy.

I know that they did a great deal to draw money from the employés in the navy-yards. I hold here an assessment circular of the Republican committee, signed by my good friend from Iowa [D. B. HENDERSON], who levied these contributions on the employés.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] if that is the same assessment which he referred to six or eight times last year?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; and I will refer to it until I die.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is the same one?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; and every time I shoot it off at you you duck under. [Laughter.] I ask consent to print with my remarks the assessment circular to which I have referred.

There was no objection.

The circular is as follows:

[Jay A. Hubbell, chairman; D. B. Henderson, secretary; executive committee, Hon. W. B. Allison, Hon. Eugene Hale, Hon. Nelson W. Aldrich, Hon. Frank Hiscock, Hon. George M. Robeson, Hon. William McKinley, jr., Hon. George R. Davis, Hon. Horatio G. Fisher, Hon. Horace F. Page, Hon. W. H. Calkins, Hon. Thomas Ryan, Hon. William D. Washburn, Hon. L. C. Houk, Hon. R. T. Van Horn, Hon. Orlando Hubbs.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE, 1882,
520 THIRTEENTH STREET, NORTHWEST,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1882.

SIR: This committee is organized for the protection of the interests of the Republican party in each of the Congressional districts of the Union. In order that it may prepare, print, and circulate suitable documents illustrating the issues which distinguish the Republican party from any other and may meet all proper expenses incident to the campaign the committee feels authorized to apply to all citizens whose principles or interests are involved in the struggle. Under the circumstances in which the country finds itself placed the committee believes that you will esteem it both a privilege and a pleasure to make to its fund a contribution, which it is hoped may not be less than $——. The committee is authorized to state that such voluntary contribution from persons employed in the service of the United States will not be objected to in any official quarter.

The labors of the committee will affect the result of the Presidential election in 1884 as well as the Congressional struggle; and it may therefore reasonably hope to have the sympathy and assistance of all who look with dread upon the possibility of the restoration of the Democratic party to the control of the Government.

Please make prompt and favorable response to this letter by bank check or draft or postal money-order, payable to the order of Jay A. Hubbell, acting treasurer, P. O. lock-box 589, Washington, D. C.

By order of the committee.

D. B. HENDERSON, Secretary.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this question of the staff and line officers of the Navy, and the question of consolidating the bureaus of the Navy Department, and the other minor questions which have been brought up in this debate, ought all to be subordinated to the great question whether we shall build up a navy or not.

The history of the American Navy from the days of its pristine glory to its present humiliating condition is a step from the sublime to the ridiculous. I have before me the letters of Sir Charles Napier on The Navy: Its Past and Present State (London, 1851). He said in 1816 that the English navy of that day could not contend with the American Navy. Let me read from him:

They—

would have beat a French or Spanish ship who were worse than themselves, but I will stake my existence had an American line-of-battle ship fallen in with one-half of them they would have been taken.

And again:

Things are now changed. We have an enemy (for though at peace I consider America our bitterest enemy), I fear, as courageous as ourselves, and one who will have the advantage over us as long as their Navy keeps in proportion to their population, or rather as long as it is so much inferior to ours as to oblige them to act upon the defensive.

He also reluctantly admits the superiority of our officers and men.

We had, it seems, at that time the finest navy in the world. But to-day the American humorists are all poking fun at our officers, and saying that a young lieutenant who recently married a great heiress can now plug up the holes in his ship at his own expense before going to sea. That is the condition of our Navy to-day.

This side of the House is not responsible for the present condition of our Navy. The dominant party in this land had ten years in which to build up the Navy. It spent $385,000,000 on it. I venture to say that the English people have not spent as much in proportion for their navy as we have, and that for an excuse for one in the worm-eaten cheese-boxes that are disgracing our flag, parading it before the nations of the earth.

If we need a navy, and I think we need a moderate and fair navy to keep together our admirable corps of officers and men, the great question is, How shall we get it? In what manner shall we build up this navy? Shall it be by the contract system, or in our own navy-yards? What kind of ships shall we have?

I want to impress upon this House the fact that all naval architecture is groping in the dark. The nations of the earth could to-day, with advantage to themselves, pass around the hat, as it were, and take up a contribution for the purpose of enabling two great naval powers to engage in war in order to demonstrate how far naval architecture and the science of explosives have advanced.

The Committee on Appropriations of this House have been criticised because they have not appropriated money to continue the building of the monitors. I think in that they have done wisely. I hold in my hand the official journal of the Army and the Navy, a respectable newspaper, representing both arms of the service. I find in the current number of that journal an article which I will ask the Clerk to read, and request that the time taken up in its reading shall not be taken from me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time required for the reading of the article must be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. MCADOO. Then I ask leave to print it with my remarks.

[The article referred to is as follows:

The thickness of the armor of the Miantonomoh consists of a single plate 7 inches thick, the latter [the Inflexible] consisting of two plates together 24 inches thick.

Sir Thomas Brassey, in his great work, The British Navy, furnishes elaborate tables showing the penetrating power of the guns of the royal navy. Referring to these tables, it will be seen that the 9-ton 8-inch caliber gun is capable of piercing 7-inch thick wrought armor, and that the moderate caliber of 10-inch and 18-ton weight penetrates 12-inch thick armor; while the 16-inch caliber 80-ton gun of the Inflexible pierces armor plates of 22-inch thickness. The 7-inch armor of the Miantonomoh is therefore vulnerable to all classes of British ironclads, the majority of whose guns will put their projectiles clean through both sides of such turret vessels. In the face of this fact the Navy Department earnestly recommends their completion, "as they will provide floating harbor defenses sufficient for present purposes, and may justify us in further postponing the construction of any such expensive broadside armored ships as have so heavily burdened the treasuries of other nations." The sum asked for the said completion is, in round numbers, $3,598,000, which, if granted by Congress, will be worse than wasted, as the only result will be to lull the nation into false security. It is indisputable that a couple of first-class ironclads can send the whole fleet of the overrated "harbor-defense monitors" to the bottom. Congress, instead of adopting the "earnest" recommendation of the Navy Department, should forthwith order the unfinished monitors to be disposed of, and suitable harbor-defense vessels built for the three and three-quarter millions saved.

The cost of the Miantonomoh thus far is given as $1,219,784.26; original cost of the vessel, $1,190,852.84; repairs, $28,931.42. She is now lying at the Brooklyn navy-yard, where the building of her turret frames and alteration to the hull will be proceeded with in a short time. Proposals for her steel plates have been advertised for, and the plans and specifications for the work have been completed in detail by the naval Bureau of Construction and Repair.]

I want to say this about it: there is a diagram accompanying the article showing the strength and thickness of the armor of the English Inflexible and of the Miantonomoh of our Navy. The article, as will be seen, says that the ordinary guns of the English navy, the ordinary rifled cannon of the English navy, can penetrate through both sides of the armor of our ship, the Miantonomoh, on which we have spent a large sum of money. Gentlemen say there is a popular demand for a navy and that it must be met by building a fleet of cruisers and completing these monitors before either has been tested.

Now, sir, with regard to these cruisers I am afraid members may be misled. Steel cruisers sound formidable, but in reality these vessels are to be but steel shells which can be as readily penetrated by projectiles as a tin box by a bullet of sufficient calibre. Now, again, the argument that they can prey on commerce and run away from an enemy is doubtful when we reflect that foreign governments, under a subsidy system alien to our institutions, have fine mercantile ships, like the Alaska and Oregon and hundreds of others, that, with slight alterations, at her best can meet our will-be Chicago and, with better guns, advantage her in fight and outrun her in speed.

Sir, because we need a navy is no argument for running into the net of favorite contractors and scheming politicians. Let us at least test the cruisers we are now building before we contract for more. Our highest naval officers have condemned in advance the Chicago; the leading English engineers have condemned her engines. Even if she meets the best wishes of her projectors she can simply make a creditable display, while of doubtful utility. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] said the other day, this is the age of guns. The ship is but the gun-carrier; all depends on the gun carried. We are utterly behind in the matter of guns; ours are antedated. The old smooth-bores bear the same relation to the monster rifled cannon of recent date as the old flint-lock shotgun to the modern Winchester rifle. Let us, if we must have a navy, begin first to build guns. Then, with good guns, let us under favorable auspices and honest government build vessels that can go outside Sandy Hook to thunder their iron hail on the sides of a Lepanto or a Duilio and receive in return their fire unscathed. To-day we are at the mercy of almost every power, and spend more than most. A glance at the following table is instructive.

The navies of the world.

[Compiled from official documents.]

United States	139	11,115	15,686,671
Venezuela	4	200	.....

It is well to remember in connection with this table that our one hundred and thirty-nine vessels include, excepting the Trenton (wooden), not one really first-class ship, while navies having less vessels in number are vastly superior in quality.

I am in favor of keeping together, even under these discouraging circumstances, the best part of our officers and men until we have ships to float them with honor to the country. It would take twenty years to reorganize, once disbanded, such a body as we have to-day. There are thousands of able, brave, patriotic American sailors in our Navy who would shed glory upon our flag in any emergency.

Let us build the Navy from the bottom upward on solid foundations; but above all, in the light of past events, let us be sure we build it honestly. The Democratic party can safely go to the country if it is retarded in building a navy by a well-founded distrust of public servants over whom they have no control.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask leave to print additional remarks.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT].

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish merely to say that this attack upon the line and staff of the Navy is in my judgment unwarranted. In respect to our Navy, we are in exactly the same condition as every other nation of the world that is at peace. We have a number of naval officers who are enjoying themselves and drawing pay, and I do not blame them. We have in the service a class of gentlemen who are as brave as any in the world—who are perfectly willing to enjoy themselves now in time of peace, but willing also to be shot to pieces in defense of this nation if any emergency requiring it should arise. I am tired of all this nonsense, this everlasting attack upon the line and staff of the Navy. This is all I want to say.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. In the very short time conceded to me by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS], for which I thank him, I can say only a word or two upon three or four topics, each of which deserves at least half an hour.

It has been stated time and again that the monitors now in course of construction and in an incomplete condition will not float. I assert here that no respectable engineer can be found from one end of the country to the other who if he knows anything about the subject will deny that those monitors are the best vessels of their class in the world, and if completed according to the present plan will be the most effective war vessels for our harbor and coast defenses that could be devised by mortal man.

I am tired of hearing this unfounded statement that these vessels will not float. The Puritan, the largest of the class, has been attacked time and again by the newspapers bent upon breaking down the American Navy. The charge has been reiterated that she would not float. Sir, when launched by the builder she floated sixteen inches higher than the specifications called for, showing that she had that much more buoyancy than had been anticipated.

As to the new cruisers, it was stated here yesterday that they are wholly ineffective as vessels of war. The statement is not true. They are the best vessels that modern skill and experience have brought forward, and armed with high-power guns they would be most effective against the largest ironclads of the world. The question to-day is not a question of ships but a question of guns. If these cruisers are armed with proper guns, they can without fear meet in single combat any vessel of any nation in the world.

Sir, the question is not one of armor; for no armor can be put upon vessels which can not be pierced by modern guns. Hence the question arises how little armor we can put on our war vessels, and what other means we can employ to make our vessels buoyant. Following this idea, these vessels have been built with water-tight and air-tight compartments, so that they may be pierced through and through, and still be as buoyant as they were in the first instance; while heavy ironclads, if once pierced, as they can be, by the high-power guns now in use, would go to the bottom as quickly as solid shot. There is no intelligent naval officer in our service or in the service of any foreign government who would not prefer to go to war in one of these new steel cruisers to going to war in any ironclad of any navy in the world; for these cruisers are more effective than any other war vessels.

The statement that the Chief Constructor of the Navy has said these vessels are a failure is a misstatement. He did not say anything of the kind. He said that they could be improved in some particulars; and when we reach the proper stage in the consideration of this bill, I propose to offer an amendment which will, I think, improve them vastly, as it will substitute full sail power for two-thirds sail power, as proposed, and will substitute a telescopic smoke-stack for the standing one, thus enabling the vessels to employ full sail power.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph as amended the following:

"That the number of captains shall be reduced to thirty, and the number of commanders be reduced to fifty; and no more promotions shall be made to these grades until the numbers are reduced below the number herein mentioned."

Mr. HUTCHINS. If I may be indulged a moment I will say that this matter was considered by the committee, who concluded——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend the amendment by adding the clause which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That reductions in the grades of captain and commander may be made by voluntary retirement, and that those officers so retired shall receive the same pay on the retired-list as do those officers of the staff with whom they have assimilated rank.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest that in order to perfect this amendment the word "relative" should be substituted for the word "assimilated."

The question being taken on Mr. HISCOCK's amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 59, noes 64.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, however, That such officers shall be retired with the same pay as if retired from age, or from wounds or disabilities incurred in the line of duty.

I understand discussion is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, there were, on a division—ayes 44, noes 61.

Mr. THOMAS. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. THOMAS.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes not counted.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not ask for a further count.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCMILLIN's amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I now move to strike out all after the word "hereafter," in line 31 of the bill, including all the amendments which have been adopted, and in lieu thereof to submit a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the portion of the bill proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

None of the vacancies in the various grades in the line and in the staff corps of the Navy shall be filled by promotion until such grades shall be reduced to the numbers fixed for the several grades of the line and staff corps of the Navy by the act of August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The President of the United States is hereby directed, on the 1st of July, 1884, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to reduce the staff corps of the Navy on the active-list as follows: Medical directors, from fifteen to five; medical inspectors, from fifteen to five; pay directors, from thirteen to five; pay inspectors, from thirteen to five; chief engineers, from seventy to fifty, by selecting from the said grades such of the officers as can best be spared from the service, and placing them on the retired-list with the rank they shall respectively hold at the time of retirement; and after the number of officers in the said grades shall be reduced as above provided, the number in each grade shall not exceed the reduced number which is fixed by the provisions of this paragraph for the several grades: Provided, That the highest relative rank of chief engineer shall be lieutenant-commander.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the substitute moved by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a special joint committee, to consist of three Senators to be designated by the President of the Senate, and four Representatives to be designated by the Speaker of the House, be appointed to consider the present condition of the Navy, and whose duty it shall be to report at the next session of Congress some plan of organization to meet the exigencies of the service and to give stability to the system of law regulating the same, and avoid the necessity of special and personal legislation in regard thereto.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point of order that changes existing law and does not retrench expenditure.

Mr. REED. I would like the gentleman to state wherein it changes the existing law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It creates a commission which the law does not now recognize.

Mr. REED. It creates a commission for the purpose of inquiring whether a change should be made, and that is all. It does not change any law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does that board exist by law now?

Mr. REED. It is a joint committee of both Houses.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But a joint committee which does not exist by law now, for in this act you provide for its creation.

Mr. REED. But the power to create it exists in the Senate and the House all the time under parliamentary law.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that any law on this subject changes existing law. The part proposed to be stricken out changes existing law, and my substitute is applicable simply to the parts which now change existing law. Any amendment germane to the subject-matter of the bill which does not increase expenditure is in order as a substitute for that portion which does change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, and it is unnecessary to give the reasons therefor.

Mr. CALKINS. I move then to strike out the entire part of the bill for which I moved a substitute.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I reserve the point of order on that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that if his motion be agreed to by the House it would reverse all that was done yesterday as to the substitution of the word "none" for "one-half." It would also defeat the proposition inserted in reference to the staff. In other words, the effect would be, so far as this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is concerned, to leave the question precisely where it was, at one-half of the line and staff.

Let me go further and inquire whether when that comes to be reported to the House are we not entitled to a vote by the yeas and nays on the change of the word "none" for "one-half."

Mr. CALKINS. We would have that benefit if it is stricken ont.

Mr. RANDALL. I mean striking out the portion of the bill indicated would not bring us to a naked vote on the substitution of "none" for "one-half."

Mr. CALKINS. If stricken out the vote would be on the substantive proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. If we adopt this it will have the effect of striking out, as I have already said, what we put in yesterday. The question is presented to the House, it seems to me, by striking out everything done yesterday but the substitution of the word "none" for "one-half."

Mr. CALKINS. I think the proposition might be divisible in the House, but I do not know about that. But that is not material, because, the proposition having been amended, it is now in order to strike out, although in striking out we may include words which have already been inserted.

Mr. TALBOTT. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if that is stricken out if it will not leave the law as it is provided under the act of August 5, 1882?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the act of 1883 will be in force.

Mr. TALBOTT. Yes, sir; March, 1883.

Mr. THOMAS. Under the act of August 5, 1882, promotions were prohibited; but the act of 1883 provided for one promotion for every two vacancies.

Mr. TALBOTT. That is it.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, the striking out of this provision will leave the law of 1883 in force, and also cut out the reduction made by the adoption of the amendment on yesterday.

Mr. HUTCHINS. It will be a reversal of the action of the committee on yesterday.

Mr. CALKINS. On one branch only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe that the point of order was made against the amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir; not against this.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 64.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. CALKINS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 65.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in after the word dollars, in line 31.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the pay and allowance of officers of the same rank and relative rank in the line and staff shall be the same, and shall be governed by the pay and allowance of officers of the Marine Corps of corresponding rank.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment. I would like to have the gentleman explain what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending clause and amendments thereto has been closed.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I make the point of order that it is new legislation and does not on its face retrench expenditures. Still I want an explanation from the gentleman, if he is permitted to give it.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement as to the character of the amendment.

Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can state whether it is or is not a reduction of expenditures. Otherwise I shall insist upon the point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. I attempted, Mr. Chairman, in a speech of some hour and ten minutes the other day to show that the present pay-tables of the different branches of the service were all at variance, one branch receiving this compensation, another so much, and another a different pay, all having the same rank. For instance, a doctor in the Navy receives $1,500 more pay on shore-duty than the man who commands the ship. And so, also, with reference to paymasters. It is high time, sir, in my judgment, to regulate the pay-tables of the Navy and put all of our officers upon the same footing—that is to say, all commanders, whether of the line or staff, shall receive the same pay as is accorded to officers of the Army; that captains shall receive the same pay, whether of the line or staff, as in the Army, and also with lieutenants. There is no reason whatever for a difference between the pay of officers of similar grades in the Army and Navy. Now, in the Army line and staff officers of the same rank receive exactly the same pay, and I respectfully suggest that it is about time we should bring into our legislation the same state of affairs with reference to the Navy, and equalize the pay of officers of similar rank.

This amendment proposes to accomplish that result. It will not cost anything in addition to the present expenditures, for the reason that the staff officers of the Navy are not allowed to reach above a certain point, and therefore they can not draw as much pay as officers of the line who attain to this high rank; and the effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to equalize the pay all along the line without any increase of expenditures.

Mr. RANDALL. I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the grounds on which the amendment is held to be out of order?

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order for the reason that the amendment is new legislation, and is not shown to be in the line of retrenchment. The gentleman himself admits that it raises certain salaries.

Mr. THOMAS. It raises some and reduces others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it changes the law and does not reduce expenditures. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the retired-list, namely: For forty-three rear-admirals, twenty commodores, eleven captains, twelve commanders, sixteen lieutenant-commanders, twenty-seven lieutenants, seven ensigns, twenty-two medical directors, two medical inspectors, four surgeons, five passed assistant surgeons, seven assistant surgeons, nine pay directors, two pay inspectors, four paymasters, two passed assistant paymasters, one assistant paymaster, eleven chief engineers, twenty passed assistant engineers, twenty-six assistant engineers, eight chaplains six professors of mathematics, one chief constructor, three civil engineers, thirteen boatswains, ten gunners, nine carpenters, and seven sailmakers; in all, $713,455.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph just read, for the purpose of correcting what seems to me to be a mistake made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

In the RECORD of yesterday I find the following language used by him:

As to the line I agree with the gentleman from Iowa. We have not got enough line officers. I showed in my speech the other day that we have not as many as we had in 1842. It is the line officers in the Navy that command our ships that maintain the flag of our country wherever the sails of commerce whiten the seas. It is the line officers that I believe this Congress should provide for and provide liberally for. In times of peace we can get along with comparatively few staff officers. In times of war their places can be again filled up. But it is the line officers this House, in my judgment, should protect. Hence, the attack made by the gentleman from Tennessee on the line seemed to me entirely unjust and one which ought not for a moment to be considered by this House.

Now, I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana whose language I have just quoted that while he personally may know more about this than I do, a few days ago when he was making the speech to which he referred in this clause which I have just read he submitted a statement going back to 1842 for comparison. I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman who I believe is quite as distinguished authority as the authority on whom the gentleman from Indiana relied. But as the gentleman from Indiana did not give his authority, I shall withhold the name of mine.

Hon. Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky:

DEAR SIR: In the report of the debate on the naval appropriation bill Hon. Mr. CALKINS stated that in 1842 the number of line officers of the Navy was 1,084, and that the Navy Register last published shows an exhibit of only 799, which Mr. CALKINS declared was "a reduction of 285 officers of the line," adding that "the staff has increased by two or three hundred officers."

You interpellated Mr. CALKINS as to the source of his information, from which, presuming you to be interested in the matter, I take the liberty to give you the following facts, from which you will see that Mr. CALKINS's informant was not altogether quite candid.

The number of line officers in the Register of 1883, including the grades of admiral and midshipman, is 829, to which, adding the boatswains, gunners, and mates, 141 in the aggregate, increases the number to 976 for 1883, and not 799.

I have no Register for 1842 at hand, but believe Mr. CALKINS's informant included all the above grades.

In 1842 there was no steam navy. The vessels were, with one exception, sailing vessels, and consequently there were no engineers.

Since 1842 the entire Engineer Corps has been added, and it numbered in 1883, including cadets, 288. Can this, which was the result of the conversion of a sailing into a steam navy, be called an increase of the staff? These 288 are the two or three hundred staff officers referred to by Mr. CALKINS as an "increase," giving the idea that the staff corps which existed in 1842 have had their numbers swelled by that amount. The 288 are for an entirely different profession from what existed in 1842, and to make a favorable showing for his side the line officer upon whose information Mr. CALKINS spoke took a date which antedated the existence of the staff corps of engineers, so that he could add the whole of that corps to the staff, and say the latter had been increased that much.

In fact, the staff corps which existed in 1842 have not been increased at all.

Mr. CALKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman to yield to me one minute.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, reserving time in which to reply.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The letter continues:

The law of 1882 reduced the 288 engineers to 170, which is the present legal allowance—a totally inefficient number—which has to be increased by the employment of machinists on the vessels whose names do not appear on the Register, but whose large pay appears on the paymasters' rolls.

The present insane attempt to reduce the number of engineers and their position is greatly to the detriment of the naval service, and results from a most irrational jealousy on the part of the line officers. I sincerely trust that Congress can discriminate between the motive of all this personal legislation and the propriety of it.

I read also the following;

When you asked him if the staff officers are not exposed to the same dangers as line officers he said, "Oh, no." Now, sir, that is not so, for there are always two engineers on deck in battle, one at the bell-pull and one at the fire-hose. In the battle of Port Royal one engineer was instantly killed and another dangerously wounded on one ship; so they are not only exposed to the same danger on deck as line officers, but are liable to be scalded to death below by shot entering the boilers. Take the case of the Richmond and Oneida, in the Mississippi River, and hundreds of other cases. I have no doubt there were more engineers killed than line officers. As to the table that there were more line officers in 1842 than staff officers, you must remember there were no steamers then. Now engineers design and superintend the building of engines and ships, and the ships of to-day are vast steam-machines, requiring men of ability to manage them.

I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana that that appears to me quite a sufficient answer to the statement he made a few days ago.

Mr. CALKINS. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in which the information with reference to the line officers in 1842 is given to the Senate Committee and also to the Committee on Appropriations of the House. A reference to it will show I was entirely accurate in my statement.

Now, I want to congratulate the committee that so far as personal legislation is concerned with reference to the staff and the line it has been stricken out of the bill already. But I want to say to the friend of my friend from Kentucky, that just such agitation as this, just such remarks as those contained in the letter which has been read, have kept the line and the staff constantly fomenting and fermenting. I would like to see it all stopped. I am not a friend to the line more than to the staff, though I have believed and do believe now that the Navy in the staff is top-heavy, and we ought to get rid of some of the dead wood of the Navy—I do not use the expression offensively—in the staff. We are rid of it now, and let us go on with the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 51 add the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall convene a board of five officers of high rank, not less than captain, to investigate the present retired-list of the Navy; and that all officers found on said retired-list by said board who have been placed there for reasons other than wounds, injuries, or disabilities, or for having reached the age of 62 years, shall be stricken therefrom."

Mr. THOMAS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Bearing on the subject I referred to a few moments ago, I have here some more interesting information for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS]. I desire, as an offset to the arguments which have been advanced, to show some of the dangers to which the staff is exposed in time of battle the same as the line officers under this new system of warfare, which did not exist in 1842. I desire in the one minute I have to submit some of the salient points on this subject which the gentleman from Indiana seems to have overlooked. I ask leave to have some memoranda on this subject printed as part of my remarks.

There was no objection.

The memoranda are as follows:

Memoranda concerning the naval Pay Corps.

Naval pay officers are only allowed clerks when on duty, and not always then—never when off duty. The clerk is allowed to the duty, not the individual. (See Revised Statutes, sections 1386, 1387, and 1388.) Thus, at the present time, with ninety-one pay officers on duty, twelve are without clerks and the remaining thirty-one, who are not on duty, have no clerks; so that with one hundred and twenty-two pay officers now in the service there are only seventy-nine pay officers' clerks.

It is not a fact that pay directors and inspectors have too much rank to go to sea; there is nothing in the law which exempts them, nor is it a fact that they can not go because they would rank their commanding officers. Pay officers can never exercise command over line officers, but are always subordinate by law to the commanding officer of the ship or station to which they are attached, even if this commanding officer is only a midshipman.

Last year one pay director was at sea, and at the present time three pay inspectors are at sea. More would no doubt be sent if there was any occasion for their services, but their most important duty is now on shore, where their long experience is of avail, and they are engaged in purchasing materials for building new ships and repairing old ones, and for equipping and provisioning them all, and in disbursing the appropriations made for the Navy. As their rank carries no pay, no saving would be effected by reducing it.

It is a fact that pay officers share equally with all other officers in the dangers of a naval life, one being on each vessel of the Navy in war and peace, and equally exposed to all the perils of destruction from shot, shell, and torpedoes in war, and to storm and shipwreck in peace.

There are seven pay officers now on the active list who were especially advanced in their grades by the President and Senate under the law for gallant service in action in the late civil war. One was with Cushing in the desperate but successful boat expedition to capture the ram Albemarle; one cut down an enemy who was about to kill his commanding officer on the deck of his vessel; one in disguise carried dispatches for miles through an enemy's country and was specially thanked by Admiral Porter, and another was Admiral Porter's military secretary during his operations on the Mississippi River; one landed in a small boat under fire at Fort Fisher and conveyed the wounded off to the ship, and another was himself wounded severely in the same action; one commanded a gunboat in the action in Roanoke Sound; one was instantly killed with his commanding officer on the monitor Catskill off Fort Sumter while acting as signal officer; one brought from Brazil the news of the capture of the Florida; one commanded the powder division of the Kearsarge when she captured the Alabama; and it was a frequent custom for that important division of ships in action to be in charge of the paymaster and his clerk throughout the late civil war. The losses of the Pay Corps by shipwreck include every vessel lost at sea, the latest examples being the ill-fated Oneida and Huron, and of those now on the active-list not less than five have been wrecked at sea.

It is not a fact that the duties of pay officers are simply clerical. They combine all the functions of the Quartermaster's, Commissary's, and Pay Departments of the Army, and require in one single naval corps the same integrity, business knowledge, and varied experience as those three army corps do.

Mr. THOMAS. The reason for offering this amendment is this: the present appropriation for the retired-list of the Navy amounts to $713,450. I have given some time to the investigation of that retired-list, as well as of the active-list of the Navy. I find that under the law now when an officer comes up for promotion if he fails to show himself either morally, physically, or professionally fitted for promotion he goes on the retired-list. He is reported against if found deficient in any one of those requirements, and then, without regard to his age, instead of being kept on the active-list to perform duty, he is shoved off on the retired-list.

There are any number of officers to be found on the retired-list to-day, young men who were placed there, some because they were drunkards, others because their moral character was such as to disqualify them for promotion. Without having any other disability than that which they have brought upon themselves by their own immorality, by their lack of attention to their profession, they are shoved off on the retired-list and pensioned at two-thirds of their full pay.

I tell you that this retired-list ought to be weeded out. At least one-third of the officers on the retired-list are there not on account of having reached the age of 62 years, or having been wounded in battle, or receiving injuries in action, or on account of disabilities incurred in the line of their duty, but because they did not attend to their business and make themselves proficient in their profession, or because they contracted habits of immorality, or were guilty of other conduct that disqualified them for promotion.

It seems to me it is the duty of Congress to organize this board and have the retired-list investigated, so that those officers who have been put upon it simply because they were not fit for the service by reason of their own conduct should be stricken off. That is the object I have in view in offering this amendment. Every naval officer on the active-list, and every officer who has been put on the retired-list for wounds or injuries or disabilities incurred in honorable service or for having reached the age of 62 years, knows that this amendment should be adopted. This retired-list should be weeded out, and I hope it will be done.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to ask my colleague if he has examined this subject so as to be able to assure us that his amendment, if adopted, might not affect some persons who have been put on the retired-list without fault of their own? I suggest, by way of illustration, the case of an officer who has been put on the retired-list on account of insanity. Are all the men on that list which the gentleman's amendment would reach men who should be stricken from the service without pay? May there not be some cases which the amendment would reach of officers who should not be stricken from the list?

Mr. THOMAS. My amendment provides that all officers shall be stricken from the retired-list who have been placed there, not because they have reached the age of 62 years, not because of the wounds received in action or injuries incurred in the line of their duty, but because of disqualifications resulting from their own misconduct. The causes which I have mentioned cover every possible contingency, ground, or excuse upon which this Government can pension an officer and put him on the retired-list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I shall insist upon my point of order when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has concluded his remarks.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] refers simply to those officers who have been placed on the retired-list as the result of disqualifications for which they alone are responsible.

Mr. THOMAS. That is it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. On account of their own immoral conduct?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The purported object of the various measures which have been proposed here by the Committee on Appropriations has been the building up of the American Navy. I think that every gentleman who has spoken here has desired it to be understood that his object was in some way to benefit or improve that important branch of the public service.

I have been surprised, however, to find that nearly every proposition introduced here, nearly every clause in this appropriation bill has been devoted to striking a blow at some part of the naval service. It seems to me that the effect of the legislation here proposed is to tear down and destroy, instead of to improve and build up, the American Navy.

Let us look at this matter of the personnel of the Navy. I believe it is claimed by the gentlemen who are in the habit of deriding our naval establishment that we have nothing left but the personnel of the Navy. I desire to say to them that while we have that left we have the most important part of a naval establishment.

Gentlemen seem to think that we can strike from the rolls and put out of the service the officers who have been educated through years of faithful devotion to duty and through an unprecedented experience in peace and in war, and that when the time shall come that we may need them to maintain the honor and glory of the nation as they have in the past we can contract to be furnished with naval officers as we may contract to be furnished with guns and with ships. I desire to impress upon this House the fallacy of that idea. We can not afford to ignore the fact that we have no longer a splendid merchant marine from which to call the trained and skilled seamen that might be needed to officer and man a large naval force in time of emergency.

The most important thing which the American Congress can do to-day, in the depleted and disorganized condition of our naval service, is to retain the officers who know how to man and sail and to fight a navy when we shall build one.

Mr. Chairman, there is another element involved in this discussion. There is an element of fair play and justice involved here. I find on the one side propositions to cut down sweepingly whole sections of the staff department of the Navy, and on the other to reduce by dozens and by thirties various grades of the line corps of the Navy. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is not seemly; it is not proceeding decently and in order for the American Congress to undertake to reorganize the Navy of the United States by cutting down in swaths men who have nobly served their country in the hour of danger. In this list of captains from which it is proposed to sweep off all beyond the number of thirty I find the names of men in the prime of their lives to-day; men who have served their flag with a gallantry that will always illumine the pages of their country's history. Among the names of those whom it has been proposed to thrust unceremoniously out of the service to which they have devoted their lives I see that of the gallant Kimberly, the executive officer of Farragut's grand old war ship Hartford, who fought her batteries until the gun-deck was like a slaughter-house in the terrific and victorious passage of the forts at Mobile Bay.

I see the name of Harmony, who followed the same heroic admiral through the fiery ordeals of the Mississippi, and who carried the flag from the Gulf five hundred miles inland to the first capital of the confederacy. I see the name of Gillis, who, not content with fighting the enemy at long range, landed his sailors and joined in the siege of Spanish Fort. And there are Benham and Braine and Irwin and Belknap and others who have equally deserved generous treatment at the hands of the Government they so bravely served in its time of need. Turning to the list of commanders also selected for sacrifice in the name of economy, I find at the head of it the name of the intrepid Yates, and a few numbers below is that of the noble Greene, who took command of and so brilliantly handled the monitor when her indomitable captain, Worden, was disabled and thought to have been fatally injured in that greatest of naval duels, which resulted in the defeat and subsequent destruction of the rebel ironclad Merrimac. And so I might go on citing the names of as loyal and gallant gentlemen as ever wore a sword, who have earned the gratitude of this nation, and who ought to be treated at least with justice by the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KASSON. I now insist on my point of order, that this proposition changes existing law without retrenching expenditures.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will waive his point of order for a moment, I will take the floor and yield it to my colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE] that he may conclude his remarks.

Mr. KASSON. I will reserve the point of order a few moments longer.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall detain the House but a very few moments; and I should not stand here to occupy its time for a single moment did I not feel it my imperative duty, as an officer for a brief period in the Navy of the United States, to enter my protest against the punishment and the degradation of men who deserve reward instead of indignity at the hands of the country they fought to preserve.

I do not stand here, Mr. Chairman, as the champion of the line against the staff or the champion of the staff against the line. I stand here for justice to the gallant officers of the American Navy, line and staff, who stood at their posts, whether on the gun-deck or in the engine-room, or in the care of the wounded, throughout the time of trial when a navy meant something more than the "two logs with a flag floating over them," as described by the gentleman from Tennessee; when it meant a great and powerful and beneficent agency for the salvation of the American Republic and the welfare of mankind.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to this House to take its violent and destructive hands off the personnel of the American Navy. I appeal to this House that if this country has become so poor, if we are so lacking in means, if there is so much need of economy that we must turn adrift men who have given the very flower and fruit of their lives to the country's service, it should be done with some kind of system, with some kind of deliberation and thoughtfulness, with some sort of justice to men who by steadfast devotion and glorious achievements deserve better of us than would seem to be the disposition of the House, so far as disclosed in this discussion.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have sent to the desk an amendment to the amendment. I ask that it be read.

Mr. KASSON. I think I must now insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the amendment to the amendment, as sent up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], to be read for the information of the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "for," in the sixth line, and insert "disabilities arising out of the intemperate or immoral habits of such officers shall be stricken therefrom."

Mr. RANDALL. I insist that the point of order be now considered and decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] makes a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to this clause of Rule XXI:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

That this proposition is germane may be admitted; but that is not enough. It must, according to the rule, retrench expenditures. A proposition to organize a commission of inquiry was ruled a little while ago by the present occupant of the chair to be out of order. Now, the point is that the pending proposition does not necessarily retrench expenditures. It may possibly have such a result. But it assumes that there is a certain class of officers on the retired-list of which, as this question is now presented, the House has no knowledge. The proposition is to make inquiry, and if there be such officers then the result is to follow. Now, by looking at the Digest you will find this comment on the rule:

This rule is rigidly enforced so far as relates to amendments offered in the House and in committee.

And many members of the House will remember that at the last session this rule was in a case similar to this rigidly enforced; and the Committee of the Whole sustained the ruling of the Chair that it must appear positively that the necessary effect of the proposition is to retrench expenditures. If the pending proposition be ruled in order, there might with equal propriety be presented a proposition for an inquiry into the number of ships we have and whether any of them are sufficiently decayed to be sold, and if so, providing that they shall be sold. Thus the thing might go on to any extent. Consequently, as the Digest says, the rule is rigidly enforced that it must appear that the particular proposition will retrench expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to inquire whether this point of order was reserved in the first instance.

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. THOMAS. It is manifest the object, scope, and clear intent of this amendment are to reduce expenditure, and that its effect will be to reduce expenditure is clear to any one who will read it. It does not stand on the same footing as the amendment proposed organizing a joint committee of the House and Senate to take into consideration the system of rehabilitating and rebuilding the American Navy. It has as its object the investigation of a subject-matter of this bill. The bill provides for an appropiation of $713,450 for a certain class of officers. This proposition has as its object the reduction of that amount by eliminating from the service a part of the beneficiaries. Therefore the effect affirmatively appears that it does retrench expenditures to the extent of the number of officers who may be dropped from the Register.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the creation of the commission does not necessarily involve the expenditure of money, because the officers are already paid by the Government. And the scope of the amendment, if such officers can be found on the retired-list, their being dropped would retrench expenditure by taking them out of the Navy. The amendment is therefore ruled to be in order.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Let my amendment to the amendment be again read.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. THOMAS. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. THOMAS'S amendment as modified, and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay to petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineers' force and for the Coast Survey service, not exceeding 8,250 in all, $2,490,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move the following amendment:

Provided, The total number of officers shall not be increased above the present number until there are at least five seamen and enlisted men to every officer.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good deal during the discussion of this bill about the officers of the Navy. I would like to say a word about the seamen and enlisted men in the naval service, the men who, when the conflict comes, are expected to hold the deck and man the guns.

I should like to inquire, first, of the gentleman in charge of the bill how many of this class there are and what is meant in the bill by "seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys?" Who are included in the word "landsmen?" I find no such class in the Naval Register, but I find in the Official Register 3,600 men reported as on duty at our navy-yards and naval stations, serving in various capacities. Are these the "landsmen" referred to in the bill? They seem to be appropriated for nowhere else, and so I suppose they are included here.

Mr. HUTCHINS. They are men who are enlisted, but not skilled sailors.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. These 3,600 men employed at naval yards and naval stations—civil employés I should think they were—and 200 in the Coast Survey service, and 700 boys, and it leaves but about 3,500 seamen and enlisted men in the naval service proper. That makes one officer to every two, or at most three, seamen or enlisted men in this service. And yet we are told there are not too many officers.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] the other day seemed to assume that in proposing to restrict the number of officers and cut down the expense in this direction we were attacking the Navy itself. I did not suppose our Navy consisted wholly of officers, or that its strength and efficiency depended on its officers alone. I had supposed an efficient navy required ships and seamen as well. What are the facts? Why, we have now sixty officers to every vessel in commission, and yet we are told that there are none too many. There are eight to ten engineers to a vessel, and yet we must not reduce the staff. No matter if there are more officers to a ship than can stand on the decks, we must go on increasing their number. This bill appropriates $4,645,000 for pay of officers alone. The pay of seamen and enlisted men, deducting civil employés at navy-yards and the Coast Survey service, I take to be not over $1,750,000, or about one-third of the pay of the officers. And I find of the $385,000,000 that have been expended since the war $100,000,000 has gone to pay the officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. WARNER, of Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am very much obliged to my friend from Virginia.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that of the entire expenditure connected with the Navy since the war $100,000,000 of it had been expended for pay of officers and about one-third as much for the enlisted men. How much of the balance has been expended or wasted at our navy-yards I am not able to state, although I have been endeavoring to get this information, but it must be a large part of the remaining sum; and I say to gentlemen on the other side of this House that you can not trace thirty millions out of the three hundred and eighty which have been appropriated for the Navy to the construction of vessels. It has gone in other directions; a small part of it to pay seamen and enlisted men and nearly a hundred millions to pay officers. The rest of it has gone where? Largely to waste; and that is the reason why we have no navy now. We have officers, but neither seamen nor ships to correspond; that is our situation. If there had been more of the money appropriated in past years judiciously applied to the construction of ships our Navy would not be so top-heavy with officers as it is. We would have more ships. The fault has been in the administration. I give here a single item to illustrate navy-yard expenditures and ship-building by the Government in the past. It is taken from Admiral Porter's testimony before a Senate committee:

Senator BUTLER. Is there a navy-yard in the United States that could build a ship out and out now?

Admiral PORTER. There is. I had one built in a navy-yard once, and I assure you when I got through with her I weighed about forty pounds less than I did when I started; but we could build these in case of necessity.

Senator JONES. Whose fault was that?

Admiral PORTER. She was a very small vessel. She cost $460,000 built at a navy-yard, and she could have been built at an outside establishment for $200,000 without any trouble at all. I know this certainly, because they charged everything to that small vessel. They charged one item alone of $80,000, work put on the Trenton, and other things of the same kind. One item, I think, was a hot-house for some one in the navy-yard.

Senator BUTLER. That becomes a very important fact, it seems to me.

Admiral PORTER. You can never ascertain what a ship costs in a navy-yard.

Senator JONES. What do you attribute that difference in cost to?

Admiral PORTER. Politics. That is about the fact of it. The navy-yards are very much used for political purposes, and very naturally. If I was a politician I suppose I would do the same thing. If I could get my friends into the navy-yard, I presume I should do as others do; but at the same time, if I was in charge of the yard I would do all I could to stop it. But what I say is the fact, and it causes a great deal of the expense.

Cicero says, "economy is itself a great revenue." If that principle had been applied in the administration of our naval affairs for the last twenty years and the revenue resulting from wise economy applied to the construction of vessels, instead of having, as now, twenty-five or thirty third or fourth class vessels, we might have several what might be called respectable ships; and in this regard I am glad to see signs of improvement in the administration of naval affairs. I hope it will continue, and I think the Committee on Appropriations is moving in the right direction in restricting expenditures in directions that leave nothing to show for them at the end of the year.

What may be saved from expenditures in navy-yards and at naval stations and upon supernumerary officers in ten years will go a good ways toward building and mantaining vessels and permanently improving our naval system.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of adding to the number of ships and adding to the number of our seamen and to the general efficiency of the Navy. Not that I think we should enter upon the policy of attempting to make ourselves a great naval power to stand by the side of the other great naval powers of the world. That would be folly. Our geographical position on the globe does not require it. It has never been our policy to interfere in the affairs of other countries; and if we keep clear of entangling alliances and are just in our dealings with other countries we are in no danger of external war. No nation can afford to attack us, and will not if we are not ourselves at fault. But should we at any time determine on a different policy, and determine to become a great naval power, it would be necessary to start out, not with a half-dozen cruisers, but to build at least a hundred ships, equal to the largest and best afloat, at a cost probably of three or four hundred millions of dollars. But I do not think it our policy to attempt anything of that kind. If we had started out on such a policy twenty years ago the ships we should have built and the guns we should have put on them would be of little use now. Naval architecture and naval gunnery have been and still are in a formative state. Europe has wasted more money on navies and naval armaments in the last half century than in any other way since the Crusades.

We need, no doubt, to add somewhat to the number of our vessels and to improve their character, adopting the latest improvements, going from wood and iron to steel, and in other ways increasing the efficiency of our Navy to the extent required to protect our commerce and give us relatively more ships and more seamen to the number of officers. I know it is not the fault of the officers of the Navy that we have not more ships and more seamen, nor am I casting any reflection upon the personnel of the officers. Far from that. We have as efficient officers as any other country. What I say is that we have too many relatively to seamen and ships. We want fewer officers or more ships. I find in referring to the English naval service, from data I find in the Reform Almanac, a high authority, which gives the latest official publication upon that subject, that with two hundred and forty-three naval vessels Great Britain has 57,000 seamen, including marines, and 4,000 officers, being an average of one officer to about fifteen seamen and seventeen officers to a ship, while in our service we have one officer to two, or at most three, seamen and enlisted men—the men who do the fighting when the struggle comes, if it shall ever come—and sixty officers to a ship.

I ask now to be allowed to add some figures and include a few items covering some of the points to which I have thus briefly alluded.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make the point of order upon the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For two secretaries, one to the Admiral and one to the Vice-Admiral, clerks to paymasters, clerks at inspections, navy-yards, and stations, and extra pay to men enlisted under honorable discharge; commission and interest, transportation of funds, exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of apothecaries, yeomen, and civilian employés, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of naval cadets while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as cadets, and for the payment of any such officers as may be in service, either upon the active or retired list, during the year ending June 30, 1885, in excess of the numbers of each class provided for in this act, and for any increase of pay arising from different duty, as the needs of the service may require; for rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices at the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage; telegraphing, foreign and domestic; telephones; copying; care of library; mail and express wagons, and livery and express fees; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress, and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; care and transportation of the dead; reports, professional investigation, cost of special instruction, and information from abroad and the collection and classification thereof, $375,000.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment in this connection.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers, clerks, or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular Navy, in the grade having graduated pay held by such officers at the time of the passage of this act. And the record of all service of every such officer shall be entered in full opposite his name in the appropriate columns of the Naval Register in the same manner as service in the regular Navy is credited: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer Army or Navy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment until I hear an explanation from the gentleman as to its purport.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, if I am correctly informed, this amendment simply regulates the rules governing those men who served in the war as volunteers and afterward were enlisted in the regular service, giving them credit for the entire time, as is done in the Army, and had been intended to be done for some time past in the Navy but by some difficulty in the Department it is not in regular form and there is no rule or regulation that governs it. This is simply to prescribe the manner in which it shall be done. It does not increase the pay of any of these parties and does not increase expenditures.

Mr. KASSON. I think that is right.

Mr. RANDALL. Does it affect the longevity-pay?

Mr. MORSE. I do not know about that.

Mr. RANDALL. I feel compelled to insist upon the point of order, for the reason that I would like, for one, to be able to examine this matter, as I think it may possibly increase the pay of some of these parties. It may, however, be a just and proper amendment, and I only insist upon the point of order to gain time to examine it. I am willing, therefore, if it meets the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to ask unanimous consent that we may go on with the consideration of the bill, and afterward revert to this matter when we shall have had time to examine it.

Mr. MORSE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing, then, that it may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CALKINS. Until we have concluded the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing, as I have said, that it shall go over, and will ask unanimous consent that when we have finished the consideration of the bill we may return to this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing this matter over informally, to return to it after the remainder of the bill has been completed?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., $15,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to amend by striking out "$15,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000,000."

Here the Democratic party intend to make an appropriation for all emergencies and confine its amount to the enormous sum of $15,000!

Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise to a point of order. The amendment has not been reported to the committee.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 94 strike out "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000,000."

Mr. BELFORD. In view of all possible emergencies coming from any quarter of the world this great Democratic party, with a majority of seventy on the floor of this House, proposes to appropriate the magnificent sum of $15,000. That is the measure of your generosity and the measure of your capacity in dealing with great national questions. [Laughter.]

I had occasion yesterday to refer to the fact that when it became necessary to protect the great wool interest of this country you buttoned up your coats and ran out of this House like political cowards. What have we done here? Bismarck, the vizier of Germany, has sent you an insulting message, and in the very face of it you declare before the country that if Germany makes war on America you will, to perpetuate and protect our honor, vote the magnificent sum of $15,000. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New York assumes credit for having reduced the estimates for the naval service from twenty-two millions to fifteen millions—a reduction of seven millions. The gentleman from Pennsylvania told me the other day, with the assurance that characterizes a citizen of Pennsylvania, that I was a member of a decaying party. I never went to the city of Philadelphia to make a speech for the Democratic party, followed by a defeat by 13,000 majority, as that gentleman did. Probably it is he who belongs to a decaying party. Pittsburgh has loomed up against him. Philadelphia has frosted and benumbed his Presidential aspirations, and he is as dead as Lazarus was without Jesus in sight to resurrect him. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. My friend from Colorado I know did not refer to me as "the gentleman from New York;" though I have gathered from certain expressions of his that he really regards me as a gentleman. The gentleman said yesterday that I ought not make speeches from manuscript but improvise them; and he paid me an elegant compliment. I know of but one little drawback to my making speeches after the manner of my friend from Colorado. They get to be so diffusive and expensive to the public. But I know that my friend is nothing if he is not dramatic; and he is entitled, coming as he does from the very tops of the Rocky Mountains with the glad sunshine upon that noble brow [laughter]—he is entitled to be dramatic.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw it.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

For foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war; services and materials in correcting compasses on board ship, and for adjusting and testing compasses on shore; nautical and astronomical instruments, nautical books, maps, charts, and sailing directions, and repairs of nautical instruments for ships of war; books for libraries of ships of war; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signal-lights, lanterns, rockets, running-lights, drawings, and engravings for signal-books; compass-fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's ways, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages, for general use on board ship, including those for the cabin, ward-room, and steerage, for the holds and spirit-room, for decks and quartermasters' use; bunting and other materials for flags, and making and repairing flags of all kinds; oil for ships of war, other than that used in the engineer department; candles when used as a substitute for oil in binnacles and running-lights; chimneys and wicks and soap used in the navigation department; stationery for commanders and navigators of vessels of war and for use of courts-martial; musical instruments and music for vessels of war; steering-signals and indicators, and speaking-tubes and gongs for signal communication on board vessels of war; and for introducing electric lights on board vessels of war, not exceeding $5,000; in all, $75,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, on line 120, after the word "war," insert "civil establishment." And in lines 121 and 122 strike out "$75,000" and insert "$80,000."

Mr. HUTCHINS. The effect of this will be to add $5,000 to the appropriation for the civil establishment.

Mr. MORSE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$80,000," and inserting "$110,000."

I simply wish to state that I am assured by the gentleman in charge of that bureau that you may just as well appropriate $10 as appropriate $75,000 or $80,000. It is impossible for him to do the work which he is required to do during the next year unless he can have the whole $110,000. I simply make that statement on his behalf because he assures me there must be a deficiency. It is impossible for him to do the work which it is intended he shall do with the amount appropriated by this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee discussed this subject and gave careful examination to the matter. We differed with the chief of the bureau. We gave $12,000 above what was expended last year for the purposes enumerated in the paragraph. It will also be observed that the next paragraph appropriates $30,000 for the navigation outfit of the four new steel cruisers. There is therefore an adequate amount it does seem to me for the purpose of fitting out what is to be the active Navy in the future service of the country.

Mr. MORSE. I send to the Clerk's desk, not to be read, because it would take too much time, but that it may be printed as a part of my remarks, a statement showing the appropriation for every year from 1866 until the present time for this branch of the Department and the purpose for which it has been used.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the memorandum to which he refers be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The memorandum is as follows:

Amounts appropriated under appropriation, "Navigation and navigation supplies," from 1866 to 1884 inclusive.

1866–'67	$192,500	1875–'76	$115,500
1867–'68	*285,626	1876–'77	103,000
1868–'69	168,000	1877–'78	103,000
1869–'70	154,500	1878–'79	104,500
1870–'71	137,500	1879–'80	104,500
1871–'72	139,500	1880–'81	104,500
1872–'73	134,000	1881–'82	111,000
1873–'74	134,000	1882–'83	100,000
1874–'75	115,500	1883–'84	100,000

*And purposes incidental to navigation.

It will be seen from the above amounts that the appropriation for supplying naval vessels with the necessary articles of navigation outfit has steadily been decreased from $192,500 for 1866–'67 to $100,000 for 1883–'84.

In consequence of the large amount of navigation stores of an imperishable nature on hand at the expiration of the civil war of 1861–'65, and the great reduction in the number of vessels in commission, the Bureau of Navigation has been able to continue to supply our vessels with instruments for navigating, which, though not always of the most improved forms, still answered the purpose for which they were originally purchased.

The steadily decreasing appropriation from year to year has prevented the bureau from obtaining better and safer but at the same time more costly apparatus for deep-sea and coast sounding, improved compasses, and more durable binnacles for mounting them, better appliances for illuminating purposes; has prevented our ships from being supplied with professional information so necessary both for officers and men, and has not permitted this bureau to keep pace with the great changes which have taken place in naval warfare since our own civil war.

Navigating implements, although of metal, will become useless in time from the casualties incident to the service, or obsolete because of the invention and adoption of more improved forms.

Compasses, on which the safety of the ship depends, will not last forever. They lose their directive force and are useless.

Chronometers are expensive, and their lifetime is put by experts at thirty years. In consequence of this limit, and it seems a wise one, the number of chronometers which were serviceable in 1865 is much decreased in 1884, and new ones are required.

The quantity of stores has gradually grown less from year to year, and a portion of them have become impaired, while the appropriation has steadily decreased.

The appropriation at no time since 1866 would have been sufficient to provide our vessels with proper outfits, had we not had on hand a supply purchased during the civil war.

By the second section of the act approved August 5, 1882, requiring all stores and supplies found by a board of appraisers to be "unserviceable" to be sold, the supplies, which might have been utilized to a certain extent in the absence of more improved and better articles, were still further reduced.

Such an inadequate supply is now on hand that the bureau felt obliged to submit an estimate for the navigation outfit of the four new steel cruisers now building.

In consequence of the order from the Navy Department directing commanding officers not to employ pilots except when the navigation was exceptionally difficult a considerable amount of money was saved, which has been utilized in purchasing a small number of new compasses, a limited quanity of navigational sounding machines, and in furnishing ships in commission with needful supplies.

Notwithstanding the greatest care and economy in purchasing, bills have been received since the close of the fiscal year of 1882–'83 from vessels on foreign stations, for necessary supplies and expenses, exceeding the appropriation for the same fiscal year by the amount of from $3,000 to $4,000.

It was impossible to provide for this deficiency, which would have been larger had not the amount paid for pilotage been greatly reduced in consequence of the Department's order.

The amount reported from the Appropriations Committee for "navigation and navigation supplies" for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, is $75,000, an amount entirely inadequate for the purpose for which it is to be appropriated. A proper administration of the bureau would require twice this amount, and should the appropriation bill as reported become a law there must inevitably result a large deficiency.

Mr. CALKINS. This is the item which has been cut down substantially $25,000. There was an appropriation last year for this bureau of $100,000, of which $37,000 was saved on account of pilotage, and expended in purchasing charts, compasses, &c., for the equipment of ships of war. The reason why there was an effort on the part of the chief of this bureau to save this money was that he might be enabled to purchase these necessary articles for the equipment of the vessels.

He made an extraordinary effort to save it, did save it, and expended it in that way. The Committee on Appropriations of this House found it out, and they now propose to deprive him of $25,000 of the saving he made, which is simply to take so much from the amount which might be expended for charts, apparatus, &c., for which he would otherwise expend the savings.

Mr. RANDALL. They are operating under the 20 per cent. clause.

Mr. CALKINS. Not if we pass this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The law is 20 per cent.

Mr. HISCOCK. This bill will be the law for next year, and you propose to change it to 30 per cent.

Mr. RANDALL. Two of the largest vessels of the Navy are likely to go off the Register even with the 30 per cent. clause.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not desire to discuss this matter at any length. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] this question: Will not the effect of this reduction be to reduce the number of ships in commission?

Mr. RANDALL. I think not. On the contrary, there is no deficiency this year.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand there is no deficiency this year, but I ask, if we give a less sum for next year than was given for this will it not reduce the number of ships in commission?

Mr. RANDALL. There is no decrease of the amount that was expended for the things included in this paragraph; in fact, we increase the amount by $12,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is the gentleman willing to assure the committee that the effect of this reduction will not be to reduce the number of ships in commission?

Mr. RANDALL. Then, why did you not give $137,000 last year?

Mr. HISCOCK. We made our appropriations upon the basis of retaining a certain number of ships in commission.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. MORSE to increase the appropriation to $110,000; and upon a division there were—ayes 58, noes 87.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment of Mr. MORSE was not agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. HUTCHINS to increase the appropriation to $80,000 was then agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For navigation outfit of the four new steel cruisers, $30,000.
For erection of compass-testing house, $7,000.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to insert as an additional paragraph that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the publication of professional papers, $10,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I reserve all points of order on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order absolute; we will lose too much time otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS. I think we had better discuss the point of order now. I want to say, however, that this amendment is offered at the request of the Department, which says that it is necessary to have this money to publish the reports and professional papers required to be put into the hands of officers going to sea.

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], I will say that if that were even true, which I do not know, the item should not come in here. It ought to come in the bill providing for printing. There is a deficiency in the appropriation tor printing for the Navy Department which the committee is now considering. We desire to break up this general system of printing in the Departments.

Mr. THOMAS. This printing is not done, as the gentleman intimates, by the printing bureau; it is done by the Departments only when specially ordered. It is for that purpose, and that alone, that the amendment is offered. It was sent here in the identical words I have used in the amendment, and I was asked by the Department to offer it, as it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. In the allotment of the appropriation for public printing there is given to the Navy Department $75,000. We have now before us an estimate for deficiency for the current year for that Department of $20,000, I think; certainly for $10,000, and I think for $20,000. If this item should go in anywhere it should go into the bill providing for printing; but I do not think it should go in anywhere; it was not in last year. I will say again that so far as I can understand the purpose of the Printing Committee of this House and of the Committee on Appropriations, it is their desire to break up this wholesale printing by the Departments, for which these enormous sums of money are expended. I think we will have the co-operation of the Secretary of the Navy in that respect. He himself has stated—I do not think I violate any confidence in so saying—he himself has stated to the subcommittee on appropriations considering the subject of deficiencies, as the gentleman from Indiana will remember, that he has stopped this character of printing in the Navy Department. Therefore we have the Committee on Printing of this House, the Committee on Appropriations of this House, and the Secretary of the Navy all working in the same direction.

Mr. CALKINS. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] in what bill the printing for the Departments is provided for?

Mr. RANDALL. In the sundry civil appropriation bill. This item was not provided for last year at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

For procuring, producing, and preserving ordnance material; for the armament of ships; for fuel, tools, materials, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at magazines, at the ordnance dock, New York, and at the naval experimental battery, $100,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By instruction of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "Ordnance Department," in the paragraph just read, insert "for the civil establishment;" and change the amount of the appropriation from $100,000 to $105,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING.

For equipment of vessels: For coal for steamers and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling; hemp, wire, hides, and other materials for the manufacture of rope and cordage; iron for the manufacture of anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, bags, and hammocks; heating apparatus for receiving-ships; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards, $700,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I am instructed by the committee to offer an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the words "receiving-ships," in line 161, the words "for the civil establishment," and change the amount of the appropriation from $700,000 to $707,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. In my general remarks on this bill I stated that in my judgment this bureau ought to be consolidated with the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing. But I shall offer no amendment now for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely: For freights and transportation of materials and stores, books, models, maps, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire-engines; machinery; repairs on steam fire-engines, and attendance on the same; purchase and maintenance of oxen and horses, and driving teams, carts, and timber-wheels, and all vehicles for use in the navy-yards, and tools and repairs of the same; dredging; postage on letters and other mailable matter on public service, and telegrams; furniture for Government houses and offices in the navy-yards; coal and other fuel; candles, oil, and gas; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of public buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire-engines and apparatus; for clerical and incidental labor at navy-yards; water-tax, and for toll and ferriages; rent of four officers' quarters at League Island; pay of the watchmen in the navy-yards; and for awning and packing-boxes, and advertising for yards and dock purposes, $200,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to amend by inserting, after the words "pay of the watchmen in the navy-yards," in lines 197 and 198, the words "for the civil establishment;" and by changing the amount of the appropriation from $200,000 to $220,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYO. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in lines 199 and 200, by adding, after "purposes," "and for building a first-class ice-boat to keep open the Potomac River to the navy-yard at Washington, not to cost more than $100,000," and substitute for "$200,000" "$300,000."

Mr. HUTCHINS. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

For support of the Medical Department: For surgeons' necessaries for vessels in commission, navy-yards, naval stations, Marine Corps, and Coast Survey, $40,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move the following amendment:

Strike out the words "$40,000" and insert "and for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy-yards, naval laboratory, and Naval Academy, $60,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy-yards, naval laboratory, and Naval Academy, $20,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to strike out the clause just read. As the committee will observe, this appropriation of $20,000 is, by the amendment just agreed to, transferred to the paragraph relating to the support of the Medical Department. The adoption of this amendment will not make any reduction of the amount appropriated by the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The Committee of the Whole rose informally; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 1482) making all public roads and highways post-roads; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 186) for the relief of Frank Galt.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair and incidental expenses, namely, advertising, foreign postage, telegrams, photographing, books, plans, stationery, and instruments for drawing-room, $1,000,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the Secretary of the Navy of the authority to order repairs of ships damaged in foreign waters or on the high seas, so far as may be necessary to bring them home.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to make a point of order.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I will reserve my point of order until the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] shall have been submitted and acted upon.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By instructions by the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "drawing-room," in line 262, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "and for the civil establishment, $1,020,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I now make a point of order against the first proviso of the paragraph just read:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material.

My point of order is that this proviso changes the existing law, which fixes 20 per cent. instead of 30 per cent., as here proposed; and the proviso also increases expenditures. When I made a point of order against the first clause in this bill the Chair held——

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will recollect, I think——

Mr. HOLMAN. If my colleague [Mr. CALKINS] will permit me——

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman will wait till I finish my sentence. The Chair held that an incidental reduction would bring a provision within the rule.

I want the same rule applied all the way through the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision of law referred to by my colleague providing for repairs not exceeding 20 per cent. is, if I understand the matter, a provision of the current navy appropriation bill and is not applicable to each successive appropriation. Now I do not think my colleague will say there is a law on this subject except a law of incidental appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken. In the appropriation bill it was fixed at 20 per cent., and that only applied to the bill passed at that year and for the fiscal year during which that bill ran.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is exactly what I have said.

Mr. HISCOCK. While the provision ingrafted in the present appropriation bill for the next fiscal year is a permanent provision applying not only to that but to all succeeding years.

Mr. RANDALL. That is because it is not the law now.

Mr. HOLMAN. But merely an incidental appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I remember it, and I believe I am correct, the provision in the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year applies only to the expenditure of the money carried by that bill. That is for the present fiscal year; while on the contrary the provision contained in the pending appropriation bill is not only permanent legislation for the money carried by that bill, but is also permanent legislation for the future.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us see how this matter stands, for we might as well understand it now as at any other time, and it will prevent disagreement hereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. One word in answer to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALKINS. One word, and I will yield to my colleague. I do not believe there is any dispute between us. My recollection is the same as that of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], that last year the provision in relation to the 20 per cent. limit was applied to the amount carried by that bill, and in this bill it is a permanent law fixing it for all time.

Mr. HUTCHINS. It does reduce expenditure for, according to the gentleman's own interpretation if you do not retain the provision contained in this bill there will be then no restriction on the expenditure of the amount appropriated, and the whole appropriation may be used for repair of wooden ships.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from New York is mistaken. The bill making appropriations for the Navy for the present year uses this language:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 20 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the Secretary of the Navy of the authority to order repairs of ships damaged in foreign waters or on the high seas, so far as may be necessary to bring them home.

As a matter of course that last clause has no application to this, and the limit of 20 per cent. provided for in that bill applies only to the current fiscal year. In that view of the matter there is then no law on the subject. In the present bill it is proposed to make it permanent, and certainly the effect must inevitably be to reduce the expenditure.

Mr. CALKINS. I will withdraw the point of order, and will move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" and this, Mr. Chairman, brings the House face to face with this single proposition whether we are to go on as we have in the last thirty or forty years expending the money we appropriated for the naval establishment in the repair of wooden ships which are now in commission.

I have a statement here prepared by the Secretary of the Navy showing the amount the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering have expended since 1867 in the repair of these wooden ships which now belong to the Navy.

It is as follows:

			100,000	Balance on hand.

It will be seen that some $44,803,532.28 has been expended by the Bureau of Construction and Repair and $21,315,512.67 by the Bureau of Steam Engineering, making in all a sum of between $65,000,000 and $66,000,000 which has been expended in repair of wooden ships, which annually require of us still other repairs. The question which now confronts the committee is whether we shall go on pouring out our Treasury in the repair of these ships, or place on the bureaus here a law so that we may drift into the making of steel cruisers and change the entire construction of our Navy. If this clause restricting the repairs to 30 per cent. be allowed to stay in the bill, then I say the amount appropriated is entirely inadequate to the necessities of the service. There is under the 20 per cent. clause $400,000 of deficiency. You propose to give the sum this year you gave last year, and yet to increase the amount from 20 to 30 per cent., which will increase the expense one-third, or else all our vessels will go out of commission.

If you leave this 30 per cent. clause in, the only thing you can do logically is to provide for $400,000, which makes up the deficiency, and add one-third, making $300,000 more, or $1,700,000 in all, instead of the amount you provided by the bill. That is all you can do to act wisely. If you leave it at 20 per cent., then $1,400,000 is required, because, as the Secretary of the Navy informs us, there will necessarily be $400,000 deficiency.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana how long it would be under the 20 per cent. rule before all of the wooden vessels of the Navy would go out of commission?

Mr. CALKINS. That of course would be only guess, and the gentleman from Ohio can doubtless give as ready an approximation to the time as I could.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have heard it stated that four years would suffice, and that by the end of that time we would have no wooden vessels.

Mr. CALKINS. That I think is a mistake. It would take a considerably longer period—perhaps ten or twelve years.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this 30 per cent. clause ought to be retained, and I entertain that belief because I perceive on the other side of this House an unwillingness to create or help to create a steel navy. Meantime we are going to find ourselves under the operation of the 20 per cent. clause without the vessels which are absolutely necessary for the ordinary purposes of a navy in times of peace.

As I am informed, the 20 per cent. clause is not in the interest of economy, if we intend to repair wooden ships at all. We are practically voting to throw away 80 per cent. of the value of our wooden ships. For myself I do not believe that is wise economy. I believe that 30 per cent. is as low a level as we ought to strike for in this matter; but I believe, on the other hand, with the gentleman from Indiana, that with the 30 per cent. clause we ought to have an increase of the appropriations, because by retaining that clause we declare a policy that we shall repair such vessels as retain 70 per cent. of their value; and if we repair such ships we will need an appropriation of a million and a half dollars at least.

I am in hopes that the House, after voting in the 30 per cent. clause, will recognize the logical result of its own action and vote a million and a half of dollars for repairs, instead of the sum proposed by this bill.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The Committee on Appropriations inserted that clause in consequence of a recommendation on the part of the chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. The committee thought if the 20 per cent. clause was retained that in the course of the next three years there would be a large reduction in the number of wooden vessels, some of which we can ill afford to spare; and in the course of the next five or six years, from natural causes, a large number—in fact, nearly all of the wooden vessels would be blotted from the Register. That is the substance of the report which has been made to us, and I need not quote from it further.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish also to call attention to the fact that the Senate, in voting for the construction of seven additional steel cruisers, has inserted a section, the fourth section of their bill, incorporating this 30 per cent. limit, which bill passed the Senate by a large majority. I believe $1,000,000 is enough to appropriate for the repair of such ships as may need repair, and still retain this 30 per cent. clause.

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], in his few remarks, stated that he was in favor of it because this side of the House had announced a determination not to proceed with the construction of steel cruisers. I am sure the gentleman did not mean to be unfair——

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will permit me, I meant to say that the action of this side of the House on the bills presented here shows that to be true, and from those bills my inference was drawn.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then if the gentleman and his side of the House when they voted last year for the construction of four steel cruisers thought it so imperative that that number should be larger, why, when they had the power to do so, did they not pass a bill increasing the number?

Mr. REED. If I may interrupt the gentleman to respond I will say that our side of the House intended to go on and add another four this year, if we had been providentially assisted in retaining the control of this House.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then we have now a bill for seven in place of four, and therefore the gentleman ought to be satisfied, because he gets three more than he expected.

Now, we appropriated for these steel cruisers everything that the Secretary of the Navy declared was necessary. Why, then, should the gentleman from Maine make such a statement? It is not right. It is made for effect. It is made to go out to the country as an intimation of an incorrect allegation that the Democratic party is opposed to the building of the steel cruisers. It is not true that they are in favor of withholding the appropriations for that purpose. The Democratic side of this House is in favor of appropriating all that is necessary for carrying on the construction of these vessels and the putting of the Navy in proper shape. The present bill gives all of the money for the completion of these cruisers that is necessary for their completion in all respects in accordance with the purpose for which they are now being built.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman from Maine now that the Navy Department itself is a divided house upon this very question. We have a report here of testimony from the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, giving a statement that in his judgment these cruisers will be failures, and he stands at the head of the department.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then why do you appropriate a dollar for them? If you believe they are failures, why not stop and not give a cent for them?

Mr. RANDALL. We make up our own appropriation bills.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The gentleman from New York asks why we do not stop appropriating for these steel cruisers. This is the reason: It is an experiment, and we propose to go on with the experiment and test the question. And the other side will be responsible. They commenced these cruisers. They passed the first enactment in regard to them. They set them on the stocks. They have gone so far with the construction of them, and if they are to be a failure we propose that the other side shall be responsible for it and not we.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the last word. A few minutes ago there was some controversy as to what the Chief Constructor did say in reference to these cruisers. I hold in my hand the testimony taken by the Senate committee and printed by order of the Senate. Here is what he says, and gentlemen can draw their own inferences as to what he means. When Chief Constructor Wilson was being examined as to these cruisers the chairman of the Senate committee asked him the following question:

You think they will be failures practically?

Chief Constructor Wilson replied:

I think these vessels will practically be failures as sea-going vessels. In smooth water there is no question but that they will have speed and that they will go along very nicely; but in a sea I believe they will be a failure.

Now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] contradicted me a moment ago and thought I was mistaken as to the testimony given by that officer. I do not think I was. It will be seen that my remark in that respect was warranted by the actual testimony given.

Mr. THOMAS. My statement was based upon the statement of the Chief Constructor himself. In a conversation had with me he said it had been reported that he had denounced the new cruisers as failures, and he said he had not done anything of the sort; that what he meant to say was that he had some objections to them; that he thought they should have some more sail power and that they were objectionable in some respects; but he did not mean to say they were failures at all. It was on his statement that I made the remark I did, without having read his testimony before the Senate committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I rely upon what I have read as showing the nature of his testimony; and I suppose he said the same as he would have done if under oath.

Mr. THOMAS. After looking at the printed evidence on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania based his statement, I see he was entirely warranted in what he did say. At the same time I make this explanation as to the source from which I received my information, not having read the report of the Chief Constructor's evidence. Having seen certain reports in the newspapers that he had made such statements, he said to me he had not.

Mr. HUTCHINS. If the gentleman will read on further in the testimony of the Chief Constructor he will find that he made other objections to those cruisers.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Does he believe the amount carried by this bill for construction and repair will be sufficient for the bureau if the percentage be raised to 30?

Mr. RANDALL. I believe an economical administration of the million dollars appropriated will be adequate at the 30 per cent. rate, which really affects but a few vessels.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is a general expression.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not a nautical man, and do not know that I can be more definite.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to say that $400,000 would be sufficient to repair the vessels, only expending 20 per cent. upon them for the current year.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman last year——

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman to hear me out. I know what we gave last year. But I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say that if the Secretary of the Navy repairs those vessels only upon which 20 per cent. can be expended, then there is a sufficiency to complete the repairs to the amount of $400,000.

Mr. CALKINS. It has been so reported to me.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, as I understand it, you reduce the appropriation $100,000, increasing the rate to 30 per cent. If this be true will there not be a deficiency—that is, a failure to repair up to the limit you have fixed?

Mr. RANDALL. I voted in the committee for a million dollars, believing that that would be adequate for all the repairs necessary under the increase of 10 per cent. as provided in the bill. But I also want to insert in this bill, and have asked the Secretary of the Navy to prepare an amendment, which he has prepared and which I have in my hand, to prevent the Secretary of the Navy spending in seven months the allotments by this Congress for twelve months.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman just keep calm? I want to add after line 272 a proviso that this amount shall be apportioned in monthly installments during the next fiscal year, and the apportionment shall be adhered to except in some emergency. I am willing to give the Secretary a discretion in case of emergency, but not otherwise.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the practice in the Department is precisely what the gentleman's amendment provides for. That is the practice there this year.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there would be no deficiency if that was law.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, well, let us understand about this deficiency. Let us have it fully understood by the committee. I say, and assert that the practice of this bureau is to divide the appropriation into monthly allowances, and that this amendment which the Secretary of the Navy has sent here will not change the practice at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that they have not done that this current year or there would not be a deficiency.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman hear me out? As to the deficiency, I say there is no deficiency. I say the money has not been expended. Now, what is the condition of things?

Mr. RANDALL. But the gentleman——

Mr. HISCOCK. Hear me, and we will have no misunderstanding about it, for I believe I am right. The Secretary of the Navy says that if he repairs all the ships in the service under the law which allows him to expend for repairs 20 per cent. of the appraised value of the ships he will require $400,000 more for that purpose than was given him. Does the gentleman understand me and follow me? I wish the gentleman to understand me upon this point. I say there no deficiency in that bureau.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a mere quibble.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. RANDALL. There will be a deficiency.

Mr. HISCOCK. Wait a moment. I am sorry that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] took the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] so that he has not followed me in my remarks. I hope that, if I require it, some gentleman will give me a portion of his time.

Mr. REED. I will do so, after your reference to me.

Mr. HISCOCK. What I say is this: This money is expended by that bureau in monthly allotments. There is no deficiency there. There is the appropriation, and the portion of it for the remainder of the year is there now. But what the Secretary of the Navy says is that if he repairs all the ships which he has the right under the law to repair, provided he has money enough for it under the law permitting him to expend for repairs 20 per cent. of the appraised value of the ships, he will need $400,000 more to do the work than we have given him. That is what he says.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the condition of things. There is no deficiency there, and there can be no deficiency there. The only question is, how many ships do you desire to have repaired and kept in commission? That is what I desire to impress upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

The Secretary of the Navy can spend no more money than you give him. He has no objection to your making this requirement for monthly allotments for the next fiscal year. I understand that from the Secretary of the Navy. But the point I make is that for the current year he has not money enough to repair all the ships within the limit of the law of the current year.

And now, when you change that limit and provide that a larger number of ships may be repaired and at the same time do not increase the amount of the appropriation, certainly your bill is subject to the objection made to it by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman last year, or the committee over which he presided, reported an appropriation of $1,000,000 for this purpose. The bill went to the Senate and that body added $100,000, making the appropriation $1,100,000, with the verbal understanding somewhere, not of record in the statute, that the increased amount was to be expended at Mare Island in the further construction of the Mohican, I think, a wooden steamer. We have given in this bill the necessary money to finish it.

I say that the Secretary of the Navy, in a communication which I hold in my hand, informs us that on the 1st of January, 1884, there was in the Treasury available of that appropriation of $1,000,000 the sum of $88,678. Now, gentlemen will see at once that whether it be the rule or not the Secretary of the Navy has not adhered to the system of monthly allotments which the gentleman from New York speaks of. If that is the rule in the Department, I want to make it the law.

The Secretary of the Navy goes on further and states that he will require further money to complete the repairs on the vessels that he has begun to repair with the million of dollars which was appropriated last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state what I know of my own knowledge, that out of that million of dollars the Secretary of the Navy proceeded with the repairs of the Ossipee at League Island navy-yard. And in the list of items given for which this additional amount of money is wanted is included the sum of $14,000 for that vessel.

I think that I have established clearly that the million of dollars appropriated last year has not been expended under any system of monthly allotments; but, on the contrary, has been exhausted, or nearly so, in the first six months of the current year.

Mr. CALKINS. If my colleague on the committee is through——

Mr. RANDALL. I want to add that we deem a million of dollars adequate for this purpose for the next year. If there were twenty vessels repaired last year, that is no reason why there should be twenty vessels to be repaired next year; it may be necessary to repair only ten. We simply say that the Secretary of the Navy shall have for this purpose the same amount which was appropriated last year for expenditure under the 20 per cent. regulation, and we do not believe that the increased percentage should require any additional money.

And we want to provide further that the money shall be expended under the system of monthly allotments, so as if possible to cut off the possibility, when the second session of this Congress or the first session of the next Congress shall convene, of being called upon to appropriate in excess of the amount agreed upon by Congress to be expended for this purpose.

Mr. CALKINS. In my judgment it does not make any difference whether the Secretary of the Navy makes monthly allotments of the amount which we appropriate for this purpose or whether he expends it all in a few months. Here is a lot of ships that come in and are out of repair. The board examines them and finds that certain of them can be repaired within the limit fixed by law, and they are immediately sent to the navy-yards for repairs.

Now, if you make an allotment of the amount appropriated, it is very clear that it simply affects the number of workmen you may employ during certain months. If the repair of a particular vessel would cost $100,000, and the work could be done by one hundred men in a given length of time, ten men will simply occupy ten times that period. So far as regards the expense, it will make no difference whether one hundred men be hired to do the work in a short time or ten men to stretch it out during the year.

The point I am insisting on is this: Prior to the last year there was no 20 per cent. provision in the law. Last year Congress adopted the 20 per cent. provision; and a million of dollars (taking out the $100,000 for the Mohican) was appropriated for this work of repair and construction. The Secretary of the Navy went on under the 20 per cent. provision, and when the 1st of January came he found he had but $88,000 left, with a number of ships still unrepaired and unfit for sea-service. He reports that $400,000 in addition to the one million already appropriated will be required to finish those ships now in the docks for repair—to do the work of the current year.

Mr. RANDALL. Did not the gentleman understand the Secretary of the Navy to say that the whole amount is gone?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; the whole amount is gone. Now, if you raise the percentage from 20 to 30, and give only $1,000,000, you must have a deficiency next year of $700,000 instead of $400,000 if this work of repairing is to be done. That is the whole of it.

Mr. REED. That is a good argument in favor of increasing the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. CALKINS. One word further. My friend from New York says there can be in fact no deficiency, because just at the moment the money runs out, if only six months of the year have expired, work will be suspended and the hands discharged.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair will treat the formal amendments as withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to amend by adding at the end of line 262, on page 12, the following:

And this amount shall be apportioned in monthly installments during the next fiscal year; and the apportionment shall be adhered to, except in some emergency.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I move to amend by striking out "twenty" and inserting "five hundred;" so as to make the amount of the appropriation $1,500,000.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment ought to follow as a matter of course after the other. The facts as they have been developed and as they are admitted by both sides are sufficient to enforce what I have said. It is admitted upon both sides that it is probably not proposed to go on at present—in any large way, at least—with the construction of a steel navy. Even the gentleman from New York says only that the Senate has passed a bill proposing to build seven steel vessels; he says nothing as to the disposition of this House; and it is commonly expected that the bill will be defeated here.

Now, we are approaching such a condition of affairs that unless something be done we shall have neither a steel nor a wooden navy. The ground I take is that we ought to repair our wooden ships and keep them going until we get a sufficient steel navy to take their place.

It has been shown on all sides that under the 20 per cent. clause $1,000,000 is not sufficient for these repairs. On the contrary, every dollar of that appropriation has been expended and the ships which were to be repaired under that provision have not been repaired. When instead of 20 per cent. you insert 30 per cent., you of course increase the number of ships to be repaired; and if an appropriation of $1,000,000 was not sufficient under the 20 per cent. provision, it follows a fortiori that $1,000,000 can not be enough after we have adopted a 30 per cent. provision. Hence we ought to appropriate, as my amendment proposes, one million and a half of dollars.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] assumes that under this 30 per cent. provision more money will be needed. The Committee on Appropriations are of opinion that, in view of the work which has been done and the present condition of the ships to be repaired, $1,000,000 will be sufficient to do the work. This is my answer to the gentleman.

The question recurred on Mr. REED'S amendment.

Mr. REED demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STEAM-ENGINEERING.

For repairs, completion, and preservation of machinery and boilers, including steam-steerers, steam-capstans, steam-windlasses, &c., in vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase and preservation of all materials and stores; purchase, fitting, and repair of machinery and tools in the navy-yards and stations; wear, tear, and repair of machinery and boilers of naval vessels; incidental expenses, such as foreign postages, telegrams, advertising, freight, photographing, books, stationery, and instruments, $750,000; and the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $1,000,000 made by the act approved March 3, 1883, for engines and machinery for the double-turreted ironclads be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, for the purposes enumerated in this paragraph: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be applied to the repair of engines and machinery of wooden ships where the estimated costs of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of new engines and machinery of the same character and power.

For contingencies, such as instruments and materials for drafting-room, $1,000.

Mr. CALKINS. I reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By instruction of the committee, in line 282, I move to insert, after the word "instrument," the words "and for the civil establishment;" and in line 283 to strike out "50" and insert "60."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order against the provision in line 283, commencing with the word "and," in reference to the engines and machinery for the double-turreted ironclads.

Before I state the point of order I may as well relate to the Chair the history of the appropriation. Last year there was $1,000,000 appropriated, to be allotted between the four monitors, Puritan, Terror, Amphitrite, and Monadnock. The Secretary of the Navy, under the act, alloted certain moneys to each of these vessels, and made a contract for completing so far as it went the first three, Puritan, Terror, and Amphitrite, which left about $182,000 or $183,000 to complete the Monadnock, which is the monitor on the Pacific coast. Congress convened before he made a contract under that law for the work on the Monadnock. The clause against which I have made the point of order seeks to divert the appropriation made last year for this fiscal year from the purpose for which it was appropriated, and to put it into the general fund for the building of other vessels. In other words, it is to stop the work on the Monadnock and put the money into the general fund, and then to reappropriate it. For instance, the Secretary of the Navy at any time up to the 1st day of next July could have made a contract under the law for work upon the Monadnock, but this clause seeks to stop that and divert the money into the general fund. My point of order is it does not reduce expenditure, and is obnoxious to the rule in changing existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. A million of dollars was appropriated for machinery and engines of four ironclads. Three were contracted for, and they are now under way and nearing completion. For the other no contract was made, and the policy of the committee is to save the money, some $172,000, by preventing its being expended on the iron-clad monitor at Mare Island, because they believed there is no occasion whatever to put an engine in a vessel for the completion of which this bill does not provide.

As will be observed, the bill does not provide for completing any of the ironclads, and if we had not been brought face to face with a contract as to the other three ironclads we would not have appropriated for them. As I make out by my arithmetic, it is a clear saving of $172,000.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative from the Pacific coast, I wish to call the special attention of this House to the present defenseless condition of that coast. We have not there at this time any war vessel which could successfully compete with any ironclad or other war vessel of a fifth-rate power. This should not be, and I am in favor of establishing a different and better condition of things as soon as possible.

I believe, sir, the policy we are now pursuing in refusing to finish the ironclads is a bad one, and I will not support it. I believe in economy and reform, but I do not believe in that economy and reform which would leave 10,000 miles of seacoast in the United States entirely defenseless and $250,000,000 of property at the hazard of war, which may happen at any moment.

The facts in relation to these ironclads have been stated both by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There were four ironclads, steel-turreted monitors, authorized to be built. One million of dollars was appropriated for them in the naval appropriation bill of the last Congress. About $830,000 of this sum has already been contracted for to finish the machinery for three of them, and there is still a hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars which remains to be used in that same direction unless it be diverted into other channels, as it will be if the present provision of this bill shall pass in this form.

Mr. Chairman, all that we on the Pacific coast ask is to have an opportunity of being placed upon a footing in respect to these ironclads as the rest of the country. All that we ask is that you place the Monadnock in the same position and condition that you place the other ironclads. Put it on an even keel with the other vessels of the same system. Complete her to the extent of putting her machinery in, and then if you choose to do so let her be laid up in ordinary, so that if this Government shall ever be required to meet an emergency, if you shall be called upon here in Congress to take steps to provide for the defense of the nation, she will require no more work to complete her and put her upon a war footing than the balance of the ships of the same class. I ask this in behalf of the Pacific coast. It is a small request that we make in consideration of the vast interests at stake on that coast.

Mr. RANDALL. I can readily understand why the gentleman from California should be so zealous in his advocacy of the completion of this vessel; but I submit that if these vessels are not to be finished there is no earthly occasion for spending this $172,000 remaining of last year's appropriation in putting machinery and engines into the Monadnock. The gentleman from California says we have left the Pacific coast defenseless. He is entirely mistaken in that particular. The last Congress provided a hundred thousand dollars for the completion of the Mohican, which is a wooden steam-vessel, and we have provided enough money in this bill to finish her, which is an adequate protection against any incursion which I think the Pacific coast may apprehend from any quarter.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania let me ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. GLASCOCK. What defense would this wooden vessel be against a Chilian cruiser or an ironclad of any other nation on earth?

Mr. RANDALL. For that matter, just about as much as if you sent the Monadnock to sea.

Mr. GLASCOCK. We do not expect her to go to sea, but to be used for coast defense. That is all we ask.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to state to him that under the point of order, if sustained, the same amount of money is appropriated, and in that respect it amounts to the same thing, as far as this provision is concerned, precisely as if it was overruled. The only difference is that it diverts the amount from one channel to another. The proposition in its present form changes existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. It provides that the money shall not be expended in the construction of machinery. It saves expenditures to that extent.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly not. It appropriates the $750,000 for these purposes specified in the preceding part of this paragraph and diverts into another channel the remainder of the unexpended appropriation. It will leave the amount precisely as I have said; precisely as it is now with the provision in.

Mr. HISCOCK. The only way the gentleman from Pennsylvania can reach the point of saving expense in that respect is by suspending the expenditure of that money.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the practical effect of the provision.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; not in its present form. You provide for its expenditure, but divert it.

Mr. RANDALL. We conferred with the Secretary of the Navy upon that point, and were informed by him that he did not propose to enter upon the contracts for the engines. He conceded that position to the subcommittee.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the manner, I say, if the gentleman will permit me to go on, in which he can reach his point is to put into the bill a provision suspending the power of the Secretary of the Navy to expend that money.

Mr. RANDALL. The present provision does that. Let us have a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this clause is a change of existing law, because it diverts a former appropriation from its former purpose to a new one. In that diversion, however, it saves the expenditure of whatever that sum of money may be.

The Chair would be of opinion that it does retrench expenditures to this extent, that it saves the necessity of appropriating again money to the same extent in this bill.

The Chair therefore feels called upon to overrule the point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. Provided they would do it.

Mr. BUDD. I move to strike out of that section the words beginning with "and," in line 283, down to and inclusive of the word "paragraph," in line 290.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from California will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $1,000,000 made by the act approved March 3, 1883, for engines and machinery for the double-turreted ironclads be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, for the purposes enumerated in this paragraph.

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to indorse and emphasize the remarks made by the gentleman from California [Mr. GLASCOCK] who spoke a few moments ago. The amount required for the completion of these monitors is about the same as the amount we voted as the rebate on tobacco. It is an insignificant sum when compared with the resources of this Government.

I speak in favor of the Monadnock. The Pacific coast is almost defenseless. We are some 3,000 miles away from the Atlantic seaboard. We are exposed to the attacks of any vessel of war that might come there. The harbor defenses are not sufficient to turn aside or keep out even a second-rate wooden vessel of war. And I say it will be no economy, but an outrage, to prevent the completion of this vessel designed for the defense of the Pacific coast.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I sympathize with the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD] in this matter, and am willing to act with him in that line of policy that would lead to some sort of defense for our seacoast. What the committee would desire, or at any rate speaking for myself what I should desire, would be to see the amount that would be appropriated, if the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, for the completion of these monitors—to see that amount saved and applied to coast defense. The trouble is that if the monitors were completed today they would be perfectly worthless. Every dollar expended upon them would be so much thrown away.

Mr. BUDD. What is the gentleman's authority for that statement?

Mr. REED. Why does not the gentleman from New York order those vessels to be broken up if that is the case, and prevent the possibility of more money being wasted upon them?

Mr. HUTCHINS. Because the gentleman from New York has not the power to do it.

Mr. RANDALL. The Army and Navy Journal recommends them to be sold.

Mr. REED. Then why do you not sell them?

Mr. RANDALL. We require legislation to do that.

Mr. REED. Why could you not have recommended that legislation here?

Mr. HUTCHINS. When by the action of this House the policy to be pursued in relation to this matter is known then we can follow with some proposition.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUTCHINS. I give way to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to offer an amendment himself in the line of what he is indicating.

Mr. BUDD. I would like the gentleman from New York to name his authority for the statement that these vessels would be useless when constructed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman from California tell me how thick the armor upon these vessels is to be?

Mr. BUDD. I have not made special investigation as to that, and can not say to the half-inch the varying thickness of the different parts.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The thickness of the armor is seven inches. And will the gentleman tell me how many inches of armor on the steel vessels can now be pierced by modern guns, the last constructed?

Mr. BUDD. Not exactly. Can you?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I will tell the gentleman. It can be pierced twenty-two inches, more than three times the thickness of this armor, and you might as well line them with wood or burn the money as appropriate it to these vessels.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me a moment?

Mr. HUTCHINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLASCOCK. The armor of the Monadnock consists of seven inches of iron faced with two inches of steel.

Mr. BUDD. Would a vessel so armored be useless?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I say certain guns are now being constructed that would pierce three times that thickness of armor. Then what is the use of going on with the construction of vessels of that class?

Mr. BUDD. Why not say, what is the use of building any vessels? Any vessel invulnerable would be ponderous, unmanageable, and unseaworthy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We go on experimenting to find out what vessels will be capable of resisting modern guns.

Mr. BUDD. What, then, is the use of building these steel cruisers?

Mr. HUTCHINS. For the purpose of cruising. They are not for defense.

Mr. BUDD. Ah!

Mr. REED. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] offers to allow me to make an amendment to break up these vessels. Now, I submit to the House that that offer is entirely in line with the usual policy of the Democratic party. When anything has got to be done they always want a Republican to do it. Now, I beg to say to the gentleman that the reason why I do not offer the amendment is because I do not believe in it. The question I ask him is why, when he says these vessels are failures—why does he not offer the amendment?

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD].

Mr. BUDD. Though I do not know the exact number of inches of iron or steel in this vessel, I do know it will float; I know it will have speed and the points essential in an ironclad; I know it will carry guns; I know it will carry a crew; and I know its guns will throw as large a ball and throw it with as much force as those of any other like vessel. And if the gentleman from New York says he does not wish to appropriate any money unless the steel armor of the vessel will turn aside the balls of the most powerful guns of the world, then he may as well say that no ironclad should ever be built, for that is the logic of his statement; because experience and experiment and the evidence of experts prove that no matter how thick the armor may be built a gun will be made that can drive a ball through it.

Why do you not withhold your appropriations from Alcatraz, Fort Point, and Black Point? There is not a single one of these that can resist balls from the most powerful guns. There is no fort in the United States that could not be battered down by guns planted to command it. And simply to say that a ball can be projected with such force as to penetrate the armor of these monitors is begging the question.

No invulnerable vessel can be constructed that will be seaworthy. Such an ironclad would be ponderous and unmanageable. As experts say, it would be sluggish and a plunger, and as the thickness of the plates increased the ship would be sunk deeper in the water and rendered more unwieldy, more deficient in speed, and defective in those points essential to success in maneuvering around a superior force. Celerity of motion, great speed, and great facility in turning appear to be some of the most important elements in ships of war. Absolute protection by plates is incompatible with sailing qualities. We can not fully protect a ship against heavy guns and retain one element of usefulness. The active little Condor at Alexandria was as useful as the great, heavily-armored tubs.

I say this matter of pretended economy is not true economy. It is parsimony. What we want on the Pacific coast is a vessel that will protect us.

I speak for the benefit of the Pacific coast. Do not leave a million of people, a billion of property, and a commerce of nearly a hundred million a year open to the attacks of every fourth-rate power and at the mercy of third-rate wooden war ships. Build the monitors and we will risk the seven to nine inches of steel and iron on them.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the Committee on Appropriations of this House can justly claim any originality in refusing to make this appropriation to complete these ironclads. The Committee on Appropriations of the last House did not recommend anything in the way of completing the ironclads, either for the machinery or for the engines. That appropriation was inserted by the Senate and finally forced through in the conference report, much against the will, as I believe, of the majority of the House of the last Congress. I remember that the other side were a great deal divided upon this very question. There were distinguished leading men on the other side who resisted altogether any appropriations for the engines and machinery of these ironclads. Yet we are invited by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to go now beyond the course followed last year and make this appropriation, although we may be certain it will ultimately require the expenditure of nearly if not quite $4,000,000.

Mr. REED. If the Chair will pardon me I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I do not invite him to make any appropriations, but to take one course or the other. If his conviction is that these ships should not be completed, then let him bring forward a proposition requiring them to be broken up.

Mr. RANDALL. The position which the gentleman from Maine wishes me to occupy is one in regard to which I can not please him anyway; whether I suggest an appropriation or whether I propose to break up the ships.

Mr. REED. I must say that the gentleman has not been remarkable for pleasing me at any time. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER, of California. In this age of progress, when the inventive genius of the race is stimulated to the highest tension with a view to warlike artifice and preparation, if we are to withhold any large naval-construction appropriations or outlays for the completion of half-finished or half-furnished vessels until an absolutely impenetrable casing shall have been made, we might as well say at once that we will stop business in the frigate and gunboat and cruiser yards altogether. It is notorious that just so soon as the proclamation has gone abroad that an impervious, indestructible iron plate has been discovered and tested, capable of defying every known piece of ordnance, some whittling or rifling Yankee or some English mechanic has come forward with an irresistible projectile, before which the last tough target presents no adequate resistance. The new armor, that was to be the perfect shield for all time to come, is perforated as though it was brown paper or shattered as though it was window-glass. Then iron sides give place to steel, and so many inches in thickness are superseded by duplicated and quadrupled sheets of the finest metal for resistance, the weight and force of the cannon rising in proportion. Have we not about reached the end of this alternating advantage of ship-armor and battery might? And, besides, in contests between vessels in harbors or on the ocean there are other elements or qualities to be considered. The victory is not always with the thickest skull or the stoutest fist. In the naval engagement something is always due—sometimes the final result is due—in greatest proportion, if not entirely, to the accuracy of the marksmen, the relative power of the engines, or the dexterity of the man at the helm. The Monadnock, furnished with the latest improved machinery and carrying the most effective rifled guns, may be, and we insist will be, a formidable antagonist. We ask for the expenditure upon her of the legitimate appropriation, and we protest against it being taken away. We acknowledge no adequate or fit substitute in the devoting of a small sum of money on a wooden vessel.

It is notorious that California is without any suitable defense for her harbors against a threatening foe. You must know that there is no kind of preparation to ward off an enemy save at San Francisco. There is a little brick wall on one side of the Golden Gate, with some side batteries, which have been pronounced by unanimous military opinion—so that here there can be no mistake—wholly insufficient to stay an incoming Chilian ironclad. Indeed, these "defenses," so called, would hardly afford a half hour's amusement to the new monitors of the deep. We have great natural advantages for defense at Black Point and Alcatraz in a contest when a face-to-face or stationary enemy is to be encountered. So one would think. And yet the power and efficiency there lodged might be spoken of too highly. For on the centennial Fourth of July the artillery there posted continued to fire for hours at an old barge or schooner, situated a few thousand yards distant, without causing serious damage, until some volunteer vessel—perhaps propelled to close quarters on orders that sprang from pity or shame—moved into close proximity and discharged an effective broadside.

We have not heard the efficiency of the Monadnock impeached to that degree that would set her aside. With all due respect, the criticisms of naval and military officers must be taken with much allowance. They do not agree with regard to these subjects among themselves; and for one I have ceased to pay much respectful attention to them, since if many of them are to be believed the Government ought to break up all her ships and throw aside as useless all the weapons in its arsenals, and proceed to manufacture entirely from new patterns for ordnance, and for lock, stock, and barrel.

I have seen the Monadnock, which up to the opening of this debate I supposed was to be set in order for us. To my layman's eye, comparing her with many I have seen of her kind elsewhere, comparing her so well as I could with vessels of her class that are said to be still approved by the most competent judges, she has the appearance of a powerful boat, well adapted for battle, and capable of being fitted and used as a worthy messenger of defense within and off the harbor of San Francisco. If you will let us have this sufficient fund to supply her with engines and place on her the stoutest cannon that she can carry, we think the money will be justly expended. We insist again that you commit an injustice if you divert this appropriation from this object.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has taken occasion to remind us that "there is not a speck of war" in the distance. That may be so, according to report from the keenest vision. Yet I will venture to say—even if I do seem to run counter to so sharp an outlook and judgment—that if there is now a "speck" anywhere of warlike import it can be discerned in the far East—in China. I do not say there is a sign of war anywhere, but of a possibility I will dare to hint in this direction. Gentlemen may smile at the presumed audacity or folly of such a conflict as I intimate. But stranger things have happened. And certain it is, if common report is to be believed, China could within two months or forty days send from her ports vessels of war that would easily pass all our land defenses and take their ransom-demanding position between the cities of Oakland and San Francisco, and what a humiliation there would be! Certain it is, past all question, that this could be done by the ironclads of our South American neighbors, whose preparedness and character and impetuosity of disposition leave that possibility entirely within the admission of every thinking man.

An iron-clad vessel of war is in our Pacific navy-yard and can readily be put in fighting trim. You do not propose to abandon naval preparations altogether. In this our request is moderate, judged by your intentions for expenditures of the nature referred to elsewhere. San Francisco is entitled to this defense; and in this instance in speaking for San Francisco and its bay we speak for California and the whole country.

Mr. RANDALL. A word in reply only. This is not a proposition to equip any of the four ironclads. It is simply a proposition to put engines and machinery into the Monadnock at an expense, with what has been appropriated for that purpose heretofore, of $200,000 in all, and with the avowed purpose not to equip her.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BUDD; and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes 103.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BUDD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUDD and Mr. HUTCHINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 108.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after line 294 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

On and after the 1st day of July, 1884, the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and of Steam-Engineering shall be consolidated, and the President of the United States shall appoint a chief of said bureau, who shall, under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Navy, be responsible for the management thereof; and hereafter no person shall be appointed to the grade of naval constructor till the number is reduced to fifteen, which number shall not thereafter be increased.

Mr. TALBOTT. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. CALKINS. It does retrench expenditures.

Mr. TALBOTT. Not at all.

Mr. CALKINS. It provides for a diminution of this corps to fifteen; so that there is a reduction upon the face of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the amendment to be read again.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. I insist upon the point of order. The amendment does not reduce the number of officers. It provides merely a rule as to promotions, a matter which is already fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT].

Mr. CALKINS. I have only to say that the amendment is not obnoxious to the rule, because it does not increase expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether it does in fact reduce expenditures.

Mr. CALKINS. When, at the outset of the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, I made a point of order upon one of its provisions, the Chair held, because I said that indirectly in the far future the provision might benefit the Treasury, it came within the rule. This case comes precisely under that ruling, because the amendment provides that until the number of these officers shall be reduced to fifteen there shall be no more appointments, and this corps shall remain thereafter at that number.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman claim that this amendment now reduces expenditures.

Mr. CALKINS. I claim that it reduces expenses in this way: It provides that the appointments to this corps shall be suspended until the number is reduced to fifteen, and that this shall remain as the number. In this way I submit the amendment comes directly within the ruling already made by the present occupant of the chair upon this bill. But I go further, and say that there is a direct saving of expenditures in this way: There are now two heads of bureaus. This makes a reduction of one; it takes one out.

Mr. MORSE. He remains in office just the same.

Mr. TALBOTT. The amendment does not legislate anybody out of office; it only provides that the duties now performed by two men shall devolve upon one man, without reducing the salary of the officer whose duties are thus diminished. The amendment does not reduce expenditures and does not change the law. It merely gives to one man the work that two men now do. But the two will still receive the same salary as at present.

Mr. MORSE. They are in the same building and the same office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not familiar enough with this subject to determine what is the fact, as gentlemen disagree in their statements. The Chair is therefore inclined to take the sense of the committee upon the point.

Mr. THOMAS. Just a word upon the point of order.

As the law now stands there are two heads of bureaus, each having the rank of a commodore by reason of being the chief of a bureau. If one of these heads of bureaus be abolished the difference between the pay of the rank of a commodore and that of a captain is saved directly. I make this remark upon the point of order, while at the same time I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take the gentleman's statement and overrule the point of order. The amendment will be submitted to the Committee of the Whole, and can be voted down if the committee so desire.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. CALKINS was not agreed to.

Mr. MCADOO. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, after line 296, add the following:

That from and after the passage of this act all war vessels not then contracted for, and the repair of all war vessels, all steam-engines, boilers, and machinery for war vessels in commission, or to be put in commission, shall be built, made, or repaired at the Government navy-yards by the Government and under the supervision of its authorized agents and officers.

Mr. MCADOO. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CALKINS. I make a point of order upon the amendment, but am willing it shall be reserved till the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] has been heard.

Mr. MCADOO. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment does not come under the prohibition of the rule, and that it is in the interest of reform and retrenchment in the Navy Department. It is admitted on both sides of this House that there have been extravagant expenditures in that Department. The larger part of the money expended has gone to contractors. I propose by this amendment that hereafter the work, instead of being done by contractors, shall be done in the yards of the Government.

There is another feature about this matter. We are unfortunately, by reason of unjust laws or other causes, not an iron-ship building people. We have not, as Great Britain has, a large number of private ship-building yards. Hence the Government, when it asks for bids, is restricted to those of one or two ship-builders. The result of this paucity of bidders is that there is not honest, wholesome competition. So that the Government is obliged almost to accept the offer of one contractor; and that contractor is the one who has built most of the vessels and received most of the money of the Government. When we authorize a ship to be built we are compelled to go hat in hand to Mr. Roach and say, "Please, good Mr. Roach, name your own figures and treat us honestly if you will." Now, I admire Mr. Roach's ability and pluck, and can hardly blame him for taking advantage of the situation; but at the same time we will be derelict in our duty if we do not curtail his advantages over the Government. We, I trust, represent the people, not Mr. John Roach.

There is another feature of this amendment which prevents it from coming under the rule: that it is not in the interest of economy. We have a large number of professional engineers under pay, whether on board or waiting orders or on shore-duty. If you open the navy-yards you may put this professional skill to work and receive some service for the salary which is paid.

I am not alone in this argument, for the Bureau of Steam-Engineering says in its report that such will be the case should our navy-yards be opened. The report reads as follows on that point:

I am of the opinion that the assistant engineer officers who have finished cruises at sea should be utilized to a very much greater extent in our navy-yards, and be ordered, not for clerical services, for which they are not trained especially, but as far as practicable to have charge as heads of the several shops, for which their profession fits them, in the place of the master workman or foreman of such shops, thus dispensing with one very considerable source of expense for yard maintenance, and with but the small increase for their pay as officers on shore-duty rather than on waiting orders. This would not only be a great saving in the cost for organization, but be a practical school for these officers, training them constantly in the line of their profession, in the minuter details of designing, making, and repairing the various parts of machinery, &c., which are used on naval vessels, together with the tools, methods, appliances, &c., for the work.

For obvious reasons the bureau would not recommend a general and sweeping change in this direction at once, thereby discharging a large class of skilled and faithful mechanics, but as vacancies occur from time to time that they be filled by these engineer officers.

The bureau is also of the opinion that there would result a very considerable saving in the expenditures for the making, care, repair, and attendance of the steam generators, and appliances of the several kinds and uses in the navy-yards, if they were all placed under the general charge and control of the engineer officers of the yards, the expense of each to be paid from the appropriations of the bureaus using the same, as now; thus giving a practical opportunity and possibility to carry out another recommendation of the navy-yard commission, that one general steam-generating establishment be provided in each yard to furnish steam for all motive power and steam-heating purposes, thereby securing "economy of fuel, reduced expense of attendance, and an increase of convenience and efficiency."

The various shops under cognizance of this bureau at the several navy-yards, with their present equipments and appliances, are in good working order, and equal to any present requirement for repair of engines, boilers, &c., or for the rapid and economical construction of new modern machinery of first-class design and workmanship.

The boiler-shops at New York, Washington, Norfolk, and Mare Island yards have been greatly improved by the addition of a few modern machine tools, and are now producing first-class boilers from very large and heavy steel plates, at a less cost per pound than has ever before been done in our navy-yards or obtainable under contract.

I am aware the honorable Secretary of the Navy advocates the contract system and inveighs against the yards. But his argument against the yards in his current report seems to me lame and inconsistent. He expresses a horror of political influence in the yards, which does him credit in the expressing it, and would cover him with infinite glory in the practice of its suppression. We on this side of the House must certainly be allowed to share his fears, and some of us, maybe, could narrate moving tales of the awful realization of the honorable Secretary's suspicions. He says, on page 18:

The question whether all the steel naval vessels of the future shall be constructed by contract, or some of them by contract and some in the navy-yards, it is not necessary immediately to determine. Assuming that the hulls of such ships might be judiciously and economically built in the yards, it is doubtful whether the machinery will ever be so constructed. All the engines for the British navy are built in private shops. But conceding that, wherever the ships may be originally built, it is desirable for the Government to possess shops fitted for such repairs as may from time to time be found necessary, it is due to truth to declare that the Government repair shops under the present system ought not to be intrusted with them.

These establishments must first be thoroughly reorganized in such a way as to exclude all political considerations from their management, otherwise bad and expensive work will be the result. We can not afford to destroy the speed of our naval engines in order to make votes for a political party.

If the yards have been used to influence elections may we not inquire who was in fault? Is it not a plea of guilty for a great political party to make this statement? We certainly can not be blamed, for it is so long since the Democratic party had anything to do with the navy-yards, save through this House, that it has almost forgotten their location. Of course when we will that work shall be done in the yards we mean that it shall be honestly performed, without regard to partisan considerations or political influences. The contract system can be as readily abused. Will not favorite contractors come down handsomely to Hubbell committees and coerce employés or only employ those who are desirable politically?

I ask the attention of the House to another fact. The Navy of the United States, mostly now under the contract system, embraces one hundred and thirty-nine vessels, and most of them are of a very poor class. The navy of Spain is composed of one hundred and thirty-nine vessels, and the majority of them are superb ironclads. It is a further fact that while it costs over $15,000,000 a year to maintain the United States Navy, it only costs a little over $6,000,000 a year to maintain the first-class navy of Spain.

In conclusion: Immunity from war—perpetual peace—is no more granted to nations than terrestrial immortality to man. The same curse that spread weeds and briers among the flowering vistas of Eden and shadowed its bowers with poison-dripping vines gave over man to epidemics, disease, "wars and rumors of wars." We should seek to spread peace, but be reasonably prepared for war. Our coast, which fringes the fairest and richest land on earth, has been protected from the monarchial freebooters of Europe by shifting sands and tortuous channels; a few million wisely spent will make it invulnerable. Our people come from all lands and go everywhere. The bed of the Atlantic is threaded and its bosom is furrowed by the wires and prows that bring it in hourly communication and contact with the seething population of the Old World. The American citizen must be protected in every land. Our flag, which is the day-star of humanity and the beacon-light to mankind struggling upward to freedom and a higher civilization, must be made respectable the world over, and, if necessary, behind its moral force must rest the hand of power. Our Constitution preaches "peace on earth, good-will to men," but the rights of our citizens and the honor of this great federation of free States must be maintained against foreign aggression.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, as he is not satisfied the abandonment of the contract system would promote economy by diminishing public expenditure.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

For completing the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch-boat authorized by act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, as follows: Chicago, $349,133.45; Boston, $231,853.28; Atlanta, $231,853.27; Dolphin, $108,660; in all, $921,500.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of the legal representatives of Matthew Smith, late deputy adjutant-general in the Virginia Continental line during the war of the Revolution, praying for such legislation as will enable them to obtain a bounty claimed under the laws of the United States. The petition is accompanied by the draught of a bill which I shall introduce when that order is reached. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. At a regular meeting of the representatives of the labor organizations of the city of Saint Louis, Mo., the subject of the importation of foreign labor under contract for the purpose of displacing American labor when it seeks to protect itself through the power of organization against repeated attempts of American employers to reduce it to the level of pauperized labor of the Old World, as shown in the late conflict between the Window-Glass Makers' Association and the manufacturers engaged in that industry, was discussed and the present and future evils to result from such importation if unchecked or unregulated by wise and patriotic legislation were forcibly portrayed, and that discussion terminated in the unanimous adoption of this resolution:

That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be respectfully requested to advocate and support by voice and vote all measures tending to prohibit the importation of foreign labor under contract into the United States, thereby securing to American citizens, as far as effective legislation can secure to them, the sacred and inalienable right to labor and to just remuneration for that labor as against the low-priced and inadequately-paid labor of the Old World.

This resolution has been transmitted to the Senators and Representatives from that State, and was evidently intended to be presented to the Senate. I will therefore request that it be received as a memorial addressed to the Senate, and that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor; and I ask that committee to give prompt consideration to the subject-matter therein mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The resolution will be so received and referred, without objection.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for further legislation for the restriction of Chinese immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial and joint resolution relative to the construction of a canal from the Mississippi River to the Illinois River at Hennepin, in the State of Illinois.

Whereas the question of cheap transportation by an uninterrupted water route between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic seaboard, by way of the great lakes, has long been one of all-absorbing interest to the people of the food-producing States of the Northwest; and

Whereas the General Assembly of Iowa has repeatedly memorialized Congress for the construction of such water route; and expressly did, by memorial and joint resolution approved February 24, 1876, urge upon Congress the construction of the same from some point on the Mississippi River between the mouth of Rock River and Clinton, Iowa, to the Illinois River at Hennepin; and

Whereas at a convention representing the people of the Mississippi Valley and the Northwest, held at the city of Davenport, Iowa, May 25, 1881, it was resolved and unanimously declared—

First. That the Congress of the United States should devise by law and sustain by liberal and efficient appropriations a system of cheap transportation by water routes, connecting the Mississippi River and its tributaries with the Eastern Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico.

Second. That it has been the policy of Congress and the desire of the people of the Northwest for many years to inaugurate and complete a system of water-channel improvement, having the Mississippi for its base; that to give greater efficiency to this policy there should be constructed from the Mississippi River, on the most feasible route to the Illinois River at Hennepin and thence to the lake at Chicago, a canal adequate to the present and future transportation needs of that great port of internal improvement is an imperative necessity for a relief from excessive freight rates on the produce and commerce of the country, and that the work so long needed should immediately be commenced; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by act of August 2, 1882, authorized the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made for the purpose of ascertaining the most practicable route for such proposed canal, which survey has been made, and an official report thereof transmitted to the Congress; and

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 8th day of January, 1884, sent to Congress his special message with respect to the construction of said Hennepin Canal, and accompanying said message with copies of the act of the General Assembly of Illinois ceding to the United States the Illinois and Michigan Canal and other documents, in which special message the President says:

"I submit the communication of the governor of the State of Illinois, with a copy of the act of the General Assembly of the State, tendering to the United States the cession of the Illinois and Michigan Canal upon condition that it be enlarged and maintained as a national water way for commercial purposes. The proposed cession is an element of the subject Congress had under consideration in directing by the act of August 2, 1882, a survey for a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin by the most practicable route to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, the canal to be not less than seventy feet wide at the water line, and not less than seven feet depth of water, with a capacity for vessels of at least two hundred and eighty tons, and also for a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the estimated cost of enlarging it to the dimensions of the proposed canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River. The surveys ordered in the above act have been completed and the report upon them included in the last annual report of the Secretary of War, and a copy is herewith submitted. It appears from these papers that the estimated yield of corn, wheat, and oats for 1882 in the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska was more than 1,000,000,000 bushels. It is claimed that if a cheap water-transportation route, which is now continuous from the Atlantic Ocean to Chicago, is extended to the upper Mississippi by such a canal great benefit in the reduction of freight charges would result to the people of the upper Mississippi Valley, whose productions I have only partly noted, not only on their own shipments but upon the articles of commerce used by them which are now taken from the Eastern States by water only as far as Chicago. As the matter is of great interest, especially to the citizens in that part of the country, I commend the general subject to your consideration.

"CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 8, 1884."

Whereas it appears by the official report of Maj. W. H. H. Benyaurd, of the United States engineers, by whom such survey was made, that three routes were surveyed, to wit, the "Marais d'Osier route," "Watertown route," and "Rock Island route:" Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to vote for and use their active influence to effect such legislation by Congress as will secure the construction at an early day of said canal upon such route as may be the most feasible and practicable and so designated by the Secretary of War, and which will be for the best interests of the people at large, and to vote a liberal appropriation therefor, to the end that said canal may be completed and opened to the commerce of the country at the earliest possible date.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to forthwith transmit a copy hereof to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Des Moines, Iowa, February 26, 1884.

A true copy of a memorial passed by the Twentieth General Assembly, now in session.

[SEAL.] JAS. HULL, Secretary of State.

Mr. SEWELL presented resolutions of the senate of the State of New Jersey; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the senate, February 25, 1884.

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the object of which is a general reduction of tariff duties as now levied; and

Whereas the passage of said bill would materially affect, if not absolutely destroy, the great industries of this State, particularly those of iron, silk, woolen, glass, and the potteries; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the duties now levied upon articles produced and manufactured in this State are not more than sufficient for the protection of those engaged in the work of producing and manufacturing the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That as any further reduction in the tariff will bring the duties below the point needed for protection and militate against labor by compelling our manufacturers and producers to compete in their own markets with the products of cheap labor of foreign countries, we earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their efforts and votes to defeat the said Morrison bill, or any other measure which may come before them having for its object the reduction of the duties upon articles manufactured or produced in this State; and

Resolved, That we affirm our belief in the principle of protection as applied to all American industries, including raw materials which are the products of American labor as well as manufactured articles; and that we look with fear and apprehension upon the doctrine of a "tariff for revenue only," which would reduce the duties and cause excessive importations of foreign products and manufactures simply for the purposes of revenue and to the great detriment of the labor and capital now engaged in this country in producing the same; and

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be requested to send a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I certify that the above is a true copy.

W. A. STILES, Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of William H. West, of Barrington, R. I., guardian of William Phillips West, minor child of Leonard P. West, late private Company G, Second Regiment Rhode Island Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 12th of December, 1883, near the beginning of this session, I introduced a bill (S. 651) to authorize the President to restore Charles Brewster to his former rank in the Army. There were a number of papers which belonged to the case but which were in the hands of an attorney and could not then be obtained. I have here the bundle of papers, consisting of memorials and testimonials in regard to the matter, and also some copies of records. I ask leave to present these papers as exhibits in the case, and move that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to accompany the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 180) for the relief of Stephen N. Smith, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1393) to reimburse Frailey & De Verne for money paid into the Treasury of the United States, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to give notice that after 1 o'clock I shall ask that that bill, which is a very small matter, be put upon its passage.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 606) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point to be selected between the north and the south line of the county of Douglas, State of Nebraska, and also to construct accessory works to secure the best practicable channel-way for navigation, and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel at such point, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1539) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point to be selected between the north and the south line of the county of Douglas, State of Nebraska, and to make the same a post-route, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel of South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, to report it favorably, without amendment, and I am instructed by the committee to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to it until after we get through with the regular morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio objects until the regular morning business is finished.

Mr. SHERMAN. After we get through with the regular morning business I shall have no objection. There is a matter pending on the table that I wish to have considered.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1502) to grant a right of way to the Fort Worth and Denver City Railway Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 81) to confirm the title of Benjamin F. Pope to his office of assistant surgeon in the United States Army, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 1010) to accept and ratify an agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Chief Moses and other Indians of the Columbia and Colville reservations, in Washington Territory, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying the same into effect, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 493) for the relief of C. S. Moss, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said: A few minutes since a report was made from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads adverse to the bill (S. 493) for the relief of C. S. Moss, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing, and allow the bill to go upon the Calendar. I want to look at it. I may consent then to its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection that will be done.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1743) for the relief of the legal representatives of Matthew Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. FARLEY introduced a bill (S. 1744) for the relief of Mrs. Martha L. Burch; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1745) for the relief of the former occupants of the present military reservation at Point San José, in the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to this case, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1746) to provide for the return of certain Nez Percé Indians to their home in Idaho; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1751) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices at Erie, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1752) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Pittsburgh, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1754) to exempt from taxation the armory property of the Washington Light Infantry and of the National Rifles, military organizations of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That Commander William Gibson be permitted to withdraw from the files of the Senate his record as furnished by the Secretary of the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-seventh Congress, there being no adverse report in the case.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Samuel Noble be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SUPREME COURT OPINIONS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to make provision that printed copies of all opinions given by Justices of the Supreme Court be furnished to every Senator as soon as filed.

Mr. HOAR. These opinions are printed in the clerk's office. To have a sufficient number of additional copies to supply the Senate with copies of all opinions filed by the judges will cost a mere trifle, probably only a dollar or two.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

GRAIN-SHOVEL PATENT.

Mr. PLATT. I think this is the proper time to make a motion which I wish to submit, and that is that the remonstrances which have been filed against the application for the extension of the grain-shovel patent, and which have been ordered from time to time to lie upon the table because a report had been made, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Patents, that we may have them before us when we have a further hearing of the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, without objection.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 64, that lies upon the table, and which was received yesterday from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment be read, and I wish the attention of the Senate to it, as it is a matter which affects the Senate as a body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to add to the joint resolution—

Which sum shall be available only for the expenses of investigations heretofore ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this seems to be an apparent attempt on the part of the House of Representatives to limit the power of the Senate over its contingent fund, my first inclination was to ask the Senate not to agree to it, but to ask for a committee of conference. I hardly think the House, in view of the known precedents of the past, would attempt to curtail or limit in any way the power of the Senate to control its own investigations, and I do not believe that the House would knowingly deny to the Senate an appropriation to carry on any investigation that the Senate saw proper to order. But as I understand that this amendment was put on rather in the nature of the expression of a desire that future investigations to be hereafter ordered by the Senate should be paid out of regular appropriations to be made in the annual appropriation bills, I do not think it worth while to raise any controversy with the House about it. Therefore I move that the amendment be concurred in, disclaiming at the same time all power on the part of the House to interfere with or control in any way the action of the Senate in regard to its investigations.

It is a fundamental principle of parliamentary law, especially of Congressional law, that each House must be intrusted in its own way and in its own manner to conduct its investigations, and that it is not courteous for either House to refuse appropriations from the common fund of the country to carry on such investigations as the other body sees proper to institute.

As I do not believe that it was the intention of the House in this case to assert a power to restrain the Senate in its investigations, I think it is better to concur in the amendment rather than to raise any question now, especially as I am advised informally that the only purpose was to regard this rather in the nature of a deficiency bill, and to leave the expenses of future investigations ordered by the Senate to be paid out of the general fund to be appropriated in the proper general appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interfere with this amendment, but I desire for one to enter my protest against the precedent sought to be set by the House in this regard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What good will the protest do when you agree to the precedent?

Mr. SHERMAN. Then we can disagree to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Our contingent fund for investigations is exhausted and was exhausted at the very beginning of the session, and yet the House of Representatives undertake to say in this amendment that this appropriation shall be used only for such investigations as have been ordered already.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me to interrupt him for a suggestion, I will state that the Senate only a few days ago, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], ordered an investigation to be made by the Committee on Territories of certain matters in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is covered.

Mr. HARRISON. Would that not be excluded by this amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. That probably would be covered by the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not sure, but perhaps the limitation proposed by the House would date from our concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would date from the passage of the resolution, which would be to-day, if we concur in the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps then it would include that investigation?

Mr. ALLISON. The investigation to which the Senator from Indiana refers is provided for; but suppose to-morrow an investigation should be found necessary in the Senate, no investigation could be made here until we asked the consent of the House for such an investigation. Does the House ask us for our consent when it chooses to make an investigation and summon witnesses? Yet they insist by this amendment that we shall enter upon no examination, no investigation of any matter relating to public affairs, until we consult them as to whether or not we shall make it. I say that it is a discourtesy to the Senate to ask us to agree to such an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. My suggestion to the Senator from Iowa was not intended to convey the impression that I justify this limitation, but rather to suggest a case where we had already ordered an investigation which might be practically vetoed by concurring in this amendment. It may be, however, that it would not limit our power to expend the money in an investigation which we had already ordered, but it illustrates the principle.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment proposed by the House of Representatives is a plain interference with the independence of the Senate. Without going so far as the Senator from Iowa to intimate that it is an intentional discourtesy on the part of the House, it appears to me to be entirely in violation of the courtesy and comity that ought to prevail between the two branches of the National Legislature. A mere protest does not prevent this action from passing into a precedent, and I trust the Senator from Ohio will consent to move that the Senate disagree to the amendment and ask for a committee of conference, in order that the matter may be fully determined.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate seems to have taken the same view that I did of this matter in the first instance, but the older I get the less disposed I am to invite a quarrel when no quarrel was intended or to invite a controversy unless it is really forced upon me. In former times the House of Representatives resented with a great deal of indignation even a delay on the part of the Senate to pass an appropriation to carry on an investigation that had been ordered by the House, and it was denounced, and I think I participated in it, as a breach of privilege, the Senate refusing by its delay to allow the House to pursue an inquiry that it had determined was necessary for the public interest. If such a purpose was indicated by this amendment I should be just as anxious to protect the right of the Senate to order its own investigation without respect to the action of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. What can be the purpose of the limitation proposed by the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. The purpose, as I am informed indirectly, is that they expect in the bill which will be speedily passed containing the ordinary appropriations for the contingent fund that ample provision will be made for such future investigations as may be ordered by the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. That is utterly impossible, because any appropriation that will be passed must apply to the next fiscal year, and can not begin until the time when Congress will possibly have adjourned. It is perfectly notorious that the bills containing this class of appropriations have even yet not been taken up in the committee of the House of Representatives, so that very likely that appropriation bill will not pass before the 1st of July, so that there must be some other purpose concealed here. At least it is impossible for me to divine the purpose from the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the natural inference to be drawn from the amendment? Wholly independent of anything the Senator may have heard outside of the amendment itself, is it not the natural inference that the House assumes the right to control the application of this amount that the Senate has asked shall be added to its contingent fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. If this should occur between two citizens it would be saying, "Well, you have committed yourself to this now, but you must not do so any more."

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question in that connection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator if in his experience in this body he has ever known a qualification like this to be put by the other House upon the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not remember it.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has ever known such an instance in the history of the Government. He has had a very much larger experience than I have. It seems to me to be entirely without precedent, without justification, and without warrant, and for one I can not submit to it. I concur in the view of the Senator from Kansas. The best thing for the Senate to do is to disagree and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the desire of the Senate (and it seems to be the general desire on both sides of the Chamber that we should have this matter clearly raised by a committee of conference) I will ask for a vote on the amendment proposed by the House, and if that is disagreed to I will move for a committee of conference with a view to confer with the House upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on concurrence with the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. HARRIS. On concurrence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Senator from Ohio distinctly stated that he would call for a vote on that proposition first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume that the Senate is opposed to the amendment, and if it is non-concurred in, I shall then ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BAYARD. I should be disposed to think that it would be well for the yeas and nays to be called on this motion in order that there might be an indubitable proof given to the other branch of the absence of any division of opinion on this subject.

But while I say that, and propose to vote for the motion to disagree to the amendment, I would draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the resolution of the Senate saw fit to indicate what they wanted this money for. It was not simply for the contingent fund of the Senate, for which the Senate are alone responsible to the country and to themselves for what they shall vote and how they shall use it, but it went beyond that and said it was for the purpose of the expenses of certain select and special committees. The Senate themselves by their resolution restrained the use of the money to certain purposes, and the House I think have gone a little further, and further than was warranted, by adding an additional condition that it should only be for investigations already ordered.

I concur in the view that the House had no right to put on that amendment, and I shall so vote. At the same time it seems to me that there was a defect in the original resolution of the Senate indicating the purpose for which the money was wanted. There was no necessity for that at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that the original proposition which was sent to the House was in the ordinary form of appropriations, for the payment of the expenses of investigating committees, not merely an addition to the fund. In order to bring the question to a point, obeying the general sentiment of the Senate, I will, against my own judgment of what is best, as I think we are making a tempest in a teapot, move to disagree to the House amendment with a view to a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio withdraws the motion to concur. Without objection that will be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a right to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And he moves that the Senate non-concur in the House amendment.

Mr. LAPHAM. Before the vote is taken I desire to say a word. It is well known both to the Senate and the House that the Senate fund for the purpose of the investigation now going on was exhausted before the passage of the joint resolution by the Senate, and that we could go no further with that investigation without an additional appropriation to carry it on. The joint resolution was sent to the House two weeks ago this afternoon, and the hands of the Committee on Privileges and Elections have been tied up for want of funds from that time to this. It now comes back with this condition attached to it. There is no possible room for doubt as to what was the purpose of attaching the condition. It admits of but one interpretation. It is obvious upon the face of it that it is an attempt on the part of the House to limit us in the use of moneys which are appropriated for the purposes of the investigation; and I trust the Senate will not sanction any such proposition as that which comes from the House. The House in effect says by this amendment, "After long delay, and with many misgivings, we have concluded to aid you this time on condition you will hereafter ask our advice before taking action."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate disagree to the House amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I think this question is sufficiently important to have a definite expression by the Senate upon it; and in order that we may have that I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House, making the motion however with the purpose of voting against it myself. I believe a motion to concur takes precedence of a motion to non-concur, inasmuch as it has a tendency to bring the two Houses together. I do it for the purpose of getting a definite expression from the Senate on this question, and shall vote against the motion myself.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote against the motion to concur in this amendment. I regard it as a clear invasion of the constitutional rights and duties of this body. We have no right, in my judgment, to surrender any of them. The House of Representatives propose to limit the discretion of this body in the use of its contingent fund, and to refuse any appropriation, as was well said by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], except such as the House sees fit to approve the purpose of. Now, sir, if we are a separate body and are to exercise the functions confided to us by the Constitution, we have no right to assent to such a plain and incontestable assumption of power by the other branch of Congress. It is our duty as Senators to maintain the constitutional rights and powers of this body, and for one I shall never consent to surrender one particle of them to the unconstitutional assumption of power on the part of the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moves a disagreement. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moves to concur in the House amendment. The Chair thinks that the motion to concur takes precedence of the motion to non-concur. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to concur.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas none, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—59.

So the Senate refused to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the matter been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has refused to concur, and the Chair supposes that concludes the consideration as much as the proposition to disagree.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a motion that a committee of conference be asked for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. Is such the pleasure of the Senate?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee of conference be appointed?

Mr. SHERMAN. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire now to call up the bill reported this morning from the Committee on Finance by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] asked to take up a bill which was reported by him this morning and it was requested that it be delayed until the morning business was through. The morning business being through, he has risen.

Mr. PENDLETON. Both Senators yield to me, and I move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 343.

Mr. VEST. Will not the Senator permit me to call up the bill I reported this morning?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield for a moment after my bill is taken up and laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130 inclusive.

Mr. VEST. Now I ask that this bill be laid aside informally for the purpose of considering the bill which I reported this morning from the Committee on Commerce.

SOUTH PASS OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration House bill 5462, the title of which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878; to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRAILEY & DE VERNE.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator from Ohio will yield to me, I should like to call up the bill to which I alluded just now.

Mr. PENDLETON. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. It is the bill reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] from the Committee on Finance this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1393) to reimburse Frailey & De Verne for money paid into the Treasury of the United States, laying aside the unfinished business informally. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely state that this is perhaps the smallest bill that has ever been presented to Congress, and it results from a mistake in a person having deposited in the subtreasury at Chicago $15. The Secretary of the Treasury says he would pay it if he had the authority, and recommends that it be paid.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, to insert in line 5, after the word "Illinois," the words "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and, at the end of line 5, to strike out "they have" and insert "having been;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered and instructed to pay to Messrs. Frailey & De Verne, of Chicago, Ill., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15, which amount having been covered into the Treasury under a misapprehension of facts as to the law in regard to the obtaining of trade-marks.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee who reported this bill. Bills have been introduced formerly for the return to persons who had obtained trade-marks of the fees which they had paid for obtaining trade-marks, it having been declared that the law under which they had obtained them was unconstitutional. I desire to know whether this bill will constitute a precedent in such cases?

Mr. MORRILL. Clearly it would not. This is merely to restore money that was by mistake deposited in the subtreasury in Chicago, and which the Secretary of the Treasury has no power to refund without an act of Congress, it having been covered into the Treasury.

Mr. LOGAN. This is recognized as being perfectly proper. The only objection to it is that it is a small bill. I think that is a merit instead of an objection. People who are poor have certainly a right to get their money back as well as men who are not poor.

Mr. PLATT. The point of my inquiry was whether it was asked to be refunded because they had paid it under a law declared unconstitutional.

Mr. LOGAN. No, it was money deposited by mistake, and there is no authority to repay it without an act of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest that the last line should read "under a misapprehension as to the law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests an amendment, which will be made unless there be objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL JURISDICTION OUTSIDE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], who reported this bill, had done nothing else, he would be entitled I think to the thanks of the country for having secured a bill much needed for the protection of American citizens in foreign countries.

The bill reported provides for the exercise of judicial power by the United States in foreign countries. Objection has been made to it that it is not authorized under our form of government, and that if it was, such judicial power would have to be exercised subject to the restrictions and the limitations of our Constitution, which are supposed to be impracticable. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States to forbid the exercise of judicial power in foreign countries, and the question arises whether there is any thing in the Constitution which authorizes it.

The exercise of sovereign power with the consent of other nations is a habitual and a necessary power for government. The extraterritorial exercise of the powers of a sovereign government has always been recognized. It is a familiar principle on the high seas, in the invasion of foreign countries, in war, and in the protection of the rights of subjects or citizens in countries other than their own. It has been asserted vigorously in our country in the case of Martin Koszta, and in many other cases. There is no question whatever that the extraterritorial exercise of the powers of sovereignty is a familiar and a constitutional act.

By what reason is it sought to except the exercise of judicial power, which is nothing but one of the attributes of sovereignty, in foreign countries? Solely because the absolute and potential exercise of sovereignty is limited to the territory of the nation exercising it, because there can be no dual supreme authority over the same subjects in the same territory; the one excludes the other; and as a matter of potential and absolute authority no power of sovereignty, either judicial or other, can be exercised in a foreign country; but it is subject to no other limitation. The power of a country to exert with the consent of another its own civil polity within a limited jurisdiction and for specified purposes in a foreign country is in no way contradicted by any of the limitations of our Constitution, nor is there any connection between those propositions.

It is said that under our Constitution the judicial power of the United States is limited by the condition that it must be within the district of the domicile of the party and by a jury of the vicinage, but these are simply limitations upon the absolute and potential exercise of authority territorially. They do not apply in reason as the limitations do in regard to the personal rights of the citizen in regard to the confronting of witnesses, in regard to the essential rights of a written accusation, of an impartial and a fair trial by a capable judge. These are the substance of personal rights and the limitations of judicial power which attach to another form of its exercise, that is the exercise of judicial power as a part of the attributes of sovereignty in a foreign country by the consent of the foreign power. This has been affirmed by the Supreme Court in all the cases on this subject.

Now, Mr. President, there can be no question whatever that this mode of exercising the sovereign power of a country, whether judicial or otherwise, is recognized clearly, as has been said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], in the treaty-making power of the country. What is the treaty-making power of the country? It is nothing but an agreement to impose restraints on the exercise of sovereign power within the territory of one of the parties making it or providing for the exercise of that sovereign power in another country. In the case of the treaty with China there is a limitation upon the sovereign power of the Government of China in respect to interference with the personal rights of American citizens. There is also a provision by the consent of China for the assertion of our civil polity, the application and the mode of application and the character of civil tribunals by which the law shall be ascertained and defined.

There is therefore in the treaty-making power not only generally but in this special case a provision for the exertion of the judicial power of the United States in the dominions of a foreign country. It is therefore clear that the judicial power of this country may be exercised in substantial conformity to the Constitution within the limits of a foreign country or extraterritorially.

Now, Mr. President, what objection can there be to the proposition that wherever the American citizen is, in whatever country, if within the power of the Government to secure it by treaty stipulations, he ought to have the protection of the laws of his own country? What possible doubt can there be that no higher duty rests upon this Congress than to see that its adventurous and enterprising citizens in foreign countries, in the pursuit of commerce, in the pursuit of information or adventure of any kind, have a right to the protection of their Government, and that protection in accordance with the fundamental and organic law of the country? The distinguishing merit of the bill which has been introduced here by the Senator from Ohio and so ably presented is that its object is to furnish that protection in substantial conformity with the civil polity and the laws of this country.

I can see no possible question of the constitutional power of the Government of the United States to extend its judicial power substantially to its citizens in foreign countries under the treaty-making power, first providing for the consent of the foreign nation to such an exercise of authority. I merely wish, without detaining the Senate, to affirm for myself that the Constitution does in its treaty-making power, not only by the universal course of history and the modern practice of nations but by necessary logical conclusion, recognize the power in the Government to extend to its citizens in foreign countries its judicial power, not subject to the limitations of trial at the place of domicile nor by a jury of the vicinage nor by a jury of a particular number, but subject to the higher and more substantial requirements of protection of the personal rights guaranteed in our Constitution by a fair and impartial trial, by protection against arbitrary authority, by an orderly and decorous course of justice, and that these rights, this portion of the judicial power as an attribute of sovereignty, may be exercised extraterritorially, and that it is in the treaty-making power expressly comprehended. A treaty is nothing more than an agreement for the exercise of sovereign power in nations by the consent of others, subject to such modifications and such qualifications as may be imposed by treaty. If this be so, this is nothing more than the exercise of our attribute of sovereignty, whether it be the judicial power or any other, within the dominion of foreign countries by their consent and for the protection of American citizens, extending to them substantially the forms of our civil polity and the protection of our laws.

What constitutes the sovereignty of a government, of what does it consist, and by what is it limited territorially? It is the supreme right to exercise its powers, whatever they may be, over its own people, and to assert them forcibly or peaceably against others for the protection of its people and their rights; that is, to make war or peace or treaties. The potential exercise of the sovereign power and discretion of a government and its forms of civil polity is confined to the territory belonging to such government only, because there can be no sovereignty, no right to govern without the rightful power to subject or compel. Each government and it alone, therefore, can be sovereign in its own territory, and its laws and civil polity as a matter of absolute power and right must be intraterritorial.

But it does not follow because absolute sovereign powers may be exercised alone over territory absolutely subject to it that these sovereign powers may not be exercised with the consent of other sovereignties over territory, subject only by their consent to it. There is nothing therefore in the nature of sovereign power, nor in the fact that its absolute and discretionary exercise must be in a territory subject to it, that forbids the exercise of such powers not absolute, but limited in a territory subject to it by the will or discretion of another and with conditions and qualifications. On the contrary, the exercise of sovereign power, modified and restrained by the consent, discretion, and will of another power, in its territories for the protection of the citizens and subjects of another country is and always has been a necessary and customary exercise of sovereign power, and is expressly contained in our Constitution in the power to make treaties and to assert its power on the high seas. And the object of treaties not exclusively but largely is to provide for the restrained and limited exercise of its sovereign powers either in their own or in foreign countries.

A treaty therefore is in itself an agreement for the exercise of sovereignty subject to limitations agreed on by the parties.

A treaty between the United States and China to give certain rights to citizens of the United States is an agreement that the sovereign power of China shall be restrained and limited by this condition. A treaty that these rights of citizens of the United States shall be judicially decided and applied by tribunals constituted by the United States, in such form and manner as the United States shall decide, is nothing but an agreement that the sovereign power of the United States shall be exercised subject to limitations imposed and by the consent of China. It is the same in both cases, an obligation in restraint of the exercise of sovereign power. It is therefore expressly provided for and contemplated in the treaty-making power of the United States.

Now as to the form and manner in which the exercise of judicial power must be made in a foreign country. Judicial power is only one of the attributes of sovereign power, and in its nature, as respects sovereignty, not distinguishable from the others. Like all other sovereign power, when exercised in foreign countries, it must be subject to their consent and by our Constitution subject to the treaty-making power in all respects. But this fact can not modify or alter the restrictions imposed on the exercise of judicial power in our form of government over our own people. The obligations of the Constitution rest as imperatively on the treaty-making power to secure for our citizens the substantial forms of our civil policy and the protection of our laws abroad and in foreign countries as at home.

Our form of government requires that the judicial power shall be exercised subject to certain defined personal rights of every person subject to our laws, and that these rights shall be ascertained through a trial in the district where he lives and by a jury of the vicinage. The same distinction exists here as in other cases of the exercise of sovereign power. The judicial power of the United States, exercised in the discretion and will of the Government as a matter of rightful territorial power, can only be over the territory subject to its power. But the judicial power of the United States exercised in the territory of a foreign nation and by its consent is as much recognized in the Constitution as the other and provided for in the treaty-making power. Because it is impossible to provide for his trial in the district and by a jury of his domicile, it does not follow that there is no power and no duty to provide for his trial and the protection of his rights by a substantial conformity to the requirements of the Constitution, by an impartial trial, by written accusation, by a jury of his fellow-citizens, by confronting the witnesses against him, by the opportunity of producing witnesses in his favor, by an honest and capable judge. It does not follow that the duty does not rest on us and that the power is not with us to give him the protection of our laws in some countries because we can not do so in all countries.

If further warrant for the exercise of judicial power is needed it will be found in the express words of the Constitution (article 3, section 2):

> The judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under treaties which shall be made under their authority, and to all cases between citizens of the States and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

There can be no doubt, then, unless there is some principle which limits the exercise of the powers of a sovereign government to its own territorial limits, that "all causes in law or equity arising under treaties," and all causes between citizens of the States of the United States and foreign states and citizens and subjects, are expressly provided for.

If treaties treat of and affect causes at law or equity arising under it and to cases between the citizens and subjects of different countries, then the express warrant of the Constitution is found for it.

The judicial power is no more limited to the territorial limits of the country than its other sovereign powers. If this is limited, then by the same argument the exercise of all other sovereign power is limited, and the United States can do nothing outside of its territorial limits. As to the limitations of the Constitution of the life-tenure and otherwise, it has long been established that these limitations do not rest on any other courts than those established in the States, and that in Territories legislative courts may be established not subject to these limitations. If so in Territories, why not in foreign countries?

It is clear that whether right or wrong it has been established that judicial power may be vested by the United States in courts not subject to these limitations. There is nothing, then, in the objection of a want of constitutional power to pass this bill. The power of the Government is constantly exercised beyond its territorial limits, and the treaty-making power is intended to provide for such exercise. The question whether the citizen of the United States ought to have the protection of the laws of his own country applied in accordance with the civil polity of his own Government is all that remains, and upon this question I think there can be no doubt.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, in conformity with the suggestion that was made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] yesterday, I desire to move a few amendments to the bill. I ask the attention of the Senator from Kansas to see whether I have apprehended him correctly and am carrying out the views he expressed and in which I intimated my concurrence.

In section 12, line 1, after the word "that," I move to insert "for the purposes of this act;" so as to read:

> SEC. 12. That for the purposes of this act there shall be appointed by the President, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The Secretary has the amendment. The Chair is informed that it was offered yesterday.

Mr. PENDLETON. It was not formally offered, but was suggested. I offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend by inserting in section 12, after the word "that," in line 1, the words "for the purposes of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 2 of the same section, at the end of the line, I move to strike out the word "district" before "judge."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 3 of the same section, after the word "judges," I move to strike out "of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In the same line, before the word "judge," I move to strike out "district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. On the same and the next line I move to strike out the words "of the United States" after the word "judge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the first clause of the section as amended, as follows:

> SEC. 12. That for the purposes of this act there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two judges for China and a judge for Japan, whose terms of office shall be eight years respectively; and in case of vacancies, the persons appointed to the place from time to time shall hold office for like terms. Each judge shall receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year, payable monthly, and his necessary traveling expenses in the discharge of his duty, payable on his own voucher, at the rate of 8 cents a mile.

Mr. PENDLETON. Now, in line 24 of section 12, in pursuance of the suggestion made yesterday and to perfect the bill according to the amendments already made, I move to strike out the word "district" before "judge."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk informs the Chair that there was an amendment adopted yesterday by which some words in that part of the section were stricken out and other language substituted.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let the amendment be made in the amendment adopted yesterday and in line 27. Was that also included in the amendment of yesterday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was not included.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 27 of section 12, before the word "judge," I move to strike out "district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 37 of the same section I move to strike out "district" before "judges."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 38 of the same section, before the word "judge," I move to strike out "district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In lines 119 and 120 of the same section I move to strike out the words "of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 121 of the same section, before the word "judge," I move to strike out "a district" and insert "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 1 of section 13 I move to strike out the word "district" before the word "judges."

Mr. PENDLETON. In section 15 I move to strike out "district" before "judge," in line 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I believe I have now made the bill conform to the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas. I think I have not missed, I certainly have not intended to miss, in a single case following his suggestions. I have no other amendment to offer.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I shall say very little in addition to what I said yesterday in regard to this very important measure. It is a measure, as I said yesterday, worthy of the best thought that can be given to it.

A great deal has been said here about the extension of the judicial power of this Government to foreign countries. It has been said that it is competent for Congress to extend the judicial power beyond the confines of the United States. I never can subscribe to that doctrine. This Constitution of ours has been framed in the most guarded and precise language. The powers of Congress are to be found under seventeen distinct grants of authority in the enumerated powers. There are seventeen clauses of power in this Constitution conferring upon Congress the great authority of legislation, and there are but two exceptions in these seventeen grants where jurisdiction can be exercised outside of the States. The general grant of authority in the seventeen clauses, as every lawyer here will admit, was intended to operate within the States of this Union; and so guarded and careful were the framers of this organic law, that when it came to the question of giving Congress the power to go beyond the States, they incorporated into the Constitution two distinct exceptions.

Nothing is clearer than what was said by Chief-Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, that the limitation of power always marked its extent; and when you find those notable exceptions ingrafted in the organic law to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, it is obvious that the framers of the Constitution never intended that Congress should go beyond the confines of the authority granted. The two exceptions to which I allude are specific. A case that comes under one of them was referred to yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who suggested that Congress had power to legislate in respect to offenses on the high seas. If you will examine the Constitution you will find that that authority is given in exact language. When it comes to legislating for places out of the jurisdiction of any particular State, such as the District of Columbia and navy-yards, over which jurisdiction has been ceded by the States, a special authority is given to Congress to legislate. These are the only two exceptions to the universal rule that the legislative arm of this Government never was intended to go beyond the confines of the territory of the States.

Reference has been made to the treaty-making power. After the framers of the Constitution had thus guarded sedulously the authority of Congress over legislative subjects and with respect to legislative power, they came to foreign countries, and they gave not to Congress, but they gave to the Senate and the President of the United States the power to make treaties with foreign countries according to the usages and customs of international law. But will any constitutional lawyer in this country claim that under the substantive grant of power in the Constitution to the President and Senate to make treaties there was thereby given to these officials authority to expand the enumerated powers previously stated in the Constitution beyond the limits there expressed. ?

Then, with respect to the judicial power, when it comes to the administration of the judicial power the Constitution provides for the appointment of judges for superior and inferior courts, who shall hold their offices, says the Constitution, during good behavior, and, as we know, are not removable except upon impeachment. But they did not stop there. So particular were they in limiting the sources of authority that they confined those courts to the cases over which they should exercise jurisdiction. The protection of an American citizen against Chinese and Japanese laws when residing there was not provided for. They left as little to inference or argument in the shaping of the powers of this Government as was possible to be left. In fact, their particularity in many instances is remarkable.

Power is given to Congress to create tribunals subordinate to the Supreme Court. That tribunal is a constitutional one and was brought into existence by the Constitution itself; but seeing that it might be necessary in the administration of justice that Congress should have power to create subordinate tribunals, the power is given to it to do so, and the judges over them are provided for in the language to which I have referred. There the authority ends. That is as far as the framers of the Constitution thought it wise to go; and after they had provided for the creation of these courts, they enumerated the causes of jurisdiction that were to belong to the courts:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;—to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

Did the framers of this wise organic law ever intend to deal with causes and give power to erect tribunals beyond the territory and provide a system of criminal and civil law for these courts to administer in Chinese territory? Whatever was done on that subject had to be done by the treaty-making power. And let me draw the attention of the Senate to the great distinction between the exercise of a Congressional power such as we are now proposing to exercise and the exercise of a treaty-making power. I admit that it would be competent for Great Britain and the United States by a public treaty to agree that the citizens of this country residing in Great Britain should be tried before the American minister, and even according to the American law, and vice versa; but when I do that I want it understood that I will not concede the right of Congress to step in and create in Great Britain or any other country by virtue of any treaty a number of tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court and set over them judges not provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, yesterday when I had the honor of addressing the Senate for a few minutes on this matter I had not before me a case decided in the Supreme Court that I desired to refer to, but could not then place my hand upon. I have it this morning, and I desire now for a very few moments to call the attention of the Senate to it.

In arguing yesterday I simply stated the matter by analogy to the power of extradition gathered from the treaty-making power under article 2 of the Constitution. I find on examining it this morning that the Supreme Court have passed directly on this very question and relieved us from all embarrassment so far as their work has any weight with Senators. That decision I knew had been made, but I could not place my hand on the book yesterday. I have it now. It disagrees entirely with the theory advanced by the Senator from Florida who has just taken his seat. It is the case of Dainese vs. Hale, carried from the supreme court of the District of Columbia:

> The defendant, as consul-general of Egypt, in 1864, issued an attachment against the goods of the plaintiff, there situate. The plaintiff and the persons at whose suit the attachment was issued were citizens of the United States, and not residents or sojourners in the Turkish dominions. For this act the plaintiff brought suit to recover the value of the goods attached.

That is the ground, that the consul-general had no authority to institute this proceeding and hear this case.

> The defendant pleaded his official character, and, as incident thereto, claimed jurisdiction to entertain the suit in which the attachment was issued.

The court held—

> That the plea was defective for not setting forth the laws or usages of Turkey upon which, by the treaty and act of Congress conferring the jurisdiction, the latter was made to depend, and which alone would show its precise extent, and that it embraced the case in question.

The court held that the plea was not good, simply because it did not set forth the laws and usages of Turkey, of which this court, of course, could not take judicial recognition. They had to be pleaded and proved as any other facts, being foreign laws and foreign usages. Upon this subject the court, speaking by Judge Bradley, say:

> It can not be contended that every consul by virtue of his office has power to exercise the judicial functions claimed by the defendant, for it is conceded that this is not the case in Christian countries. And while, on the other side, it is also conceded that in pagan and Mohammedan countries it is usual for the ministers and consuls of European states to exercise judicial functions as between their fellow-subjects or citizens, it clearly appears that the extent to which this power is exercised depends upon treaties and laws regulating such jurisdiction. The instructions given by the British foreign office to their consuls in the Levant in 1844, as quoted by Mr. Phillimore, do not claim anything more. They say:

I shall not read that. Then the court proceed:

> Historically it is undoubtedly true, as shown by numerous authorities quoted by Mr. Warden in his treatise on "The Origin and Nature of Consular Establishments," that the consul was originally an officer of large judicial as well as commercial powers, exercising entire municipal authority over his countrymen in the country to which he was accredited. But the changed circumstances of Europe, and the prevalence of civil order in the several Christian states, have had the effect of greatly modifying the powers of the consular office; and it may now be considered as generally true that, for any judicial powers which may be vested in the consuls accredited to any nation, we must look to the express provisions of the treaties entered into with that nation, and to the laws of the states which the consuls represent. (Dainese vs. Hale, 1 Otto, pages 14 and 15.)

The consul-general in this case had this authority entirely outside of the Constitution, so to speak; I mean the Constitution operating within the territory of the United States and upon the soil of the United States, because no one will contend that an officer of that character operating in that jurisdiction could issue the attachment and hear the cause. How did he do it there? He had the jurisdiction, the court said, but he failed because not pleading and proving the foreign usages and laws. He had the authority, because by treaty it was accorded to him, and under that treaty the act of the state, to use the language of the court, which he represented gave it to him. It could not have given it to him here on our soil as a matter of course, but it gave it to him in the foreign country, because he was permitted to do it by the foreign power in whose country he resided. That is all there is of it. That is this case. I need not read any more of it to the Senate. That is the gravamen of it.

As I stated yesterday, not having this book then in my hand, we go into that country under the treaty-making power; not under one of the powers given by the seventeen delegations of authority alluded to by the Senator from Florida who has just taken his seat, but under the treaty-making power; and when the treaty is made Congress can pass a law to enforce it. That is all there is of it. It is a clear case. It is within the jurisdiction of Congress under the treaty-making power.

This power is now exercised by consuls. You may call the tribunal by whatever name you please. The bill the Senator from Ohio has reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations raises it above the consular dignity, so to speak, and puts it on a judicial ground and gives it a judicial name; but it makes no difference by what name you call it, it is the authority we are to test, and not the mere official name.

Mr. INGALLS. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas, without disturbing him, a question?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. He states, and states correctly, that we go into the foreign country for the purpose of exercising certain judicial powers. I want to ask him for what purpose we go there, whether to enforce the laws of the country where the power is exercised, or the laws and customs of the United States?

Mr. GARLAND. We go in some instances to do both, as said by this decision, or to do the one or the other. It depends on the particular treaty or particular matter we seek for in our treaty.

Mr. INGALLS. The purpose of this bill, as I understand, is to throw around American citizens in foreign countries the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. GARLAND. That is true, as I understand it, to this extent: Whenever it becomes necessary in throwing that protection around our citizens to enforce the law in that country, according to the decision of the Supreme Court we can do it provided the treaty allows it. So we revolve around at last to the treaty-making power to do just what we may do and what we are permitted to do by the country in whose territory we are acting.

Mr. INGALLS. So it comes at last to this, that whether this power is exercised under the treaty clause of the Constitution or by virtue of an act of national sovereignty outside of that, we go into the foreign country for the purpose of enforcing the Constitation and the laws of this country. It seems to me very strange, that being admitted, that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Ohio should insist that the provisions with respect to the compensation of the judges, their term of office, and the trial of criminal cases by juries, should be absolutely in violation of any principle recognized by our Constitution or by our laws.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I think I can not vote for this bill, and I should like in a very few words to state the reasons why I feel unable to do so.

I suppose it is too late to question the authority of Congress to confer judicial powers upon our consuls provided they may be exercised under the treaties which we have made with foreign powers. It has been too long practiced and too long acquiesced in to be successfully questioned now. I think for more than half a century we have in some way by act of Congress conferred judicial power upon our consuls in foreign ports. I am not so well satisfied that we may go beyond that and erect on foreign soil and in foreign jurisdictions courts outside of the consular jurisdiction, courts which are in no way connected with our diplomatic or consular representation in those countries, but which are to all intents and purposes courts as much as if they were established within our own jurisdiction, with judges to be appointed here, with all the paraphernalia of courts, with forms of procedure, and with everything which makes them perfect courts, entirely disconnected with our diplomatic and consular representation. I understand it to be a new departure from the policy of this country and not sanctioned by precedent even in other countries. I have not given this matter so careful an examination that I can speak positively on the subject, but I think no country other than the United States attempts in any foreign jurisdiction to establish courts of law for the trial of cases arising between its own citizens in a foreign jurisdiction or between its citizens and the natives of that foreign jurisdiction, which are entirely disconnected from their diplomatic or consular service.

Mr. INGALLS. I have examined the practice of European nations in this particular, and the Senator is entirely correct. This is an innovation on the practice of all countries hitherto.

Mr. PLATT. That was my impression, but I was unable to speak positively. I think it is quite questionable whether we may go to this extent, but I do not base my opposition to the bill entirely upon that.

I doubt very much the policy of this bill, admitting that we have the right to establish courts, with all the authority, with all the paraphernalia of the courts of our own country, within these foreign jurisdictions, with juries and officers and procedure.

It seems to me that if possible we ought to protect the rights of our citizens by improving the consular jurisdiction, not by this new experiment of erecting courts outside of the consular service. I know that our citizens in foreign countries need more protection, need better facilities for the assertion of their rights; but I think that that may all be done by improving and enlarging if necessary the judicial power which we have assumed the right to confer upon our consuls and which nobody questions.

If juries are necessary, why not attach them to the consular courts, if you may dignify these proceedings with the name of consular courts? If anything is needed for the better protection of our citizens as to their rights or to enable them to assert and maintain their civil rights, why not provide for it through the same medium in which we have endeavored to provide for it in times past? If you must have what this bill calls a jury but which seems to be a misnomer, so that no one person shall have the issues of life or property in his hands, why not provide for it in connection with the consular proceedings so long established? If the argument is made that we do not send to these foreign countries where we have large commerce or hope to have large commerce, like China and Japan and the other countries mentioned in this bill, consuls qualified to act as judges, why not remedy that by sending there as consuls just the men whom we should send there under this bill as judges? It seems to me that there is no necessity therefore in order to protect our citizens abroad, in order to give them all the rights which we would desire them to have, that we should depart from the system so long established in this country, but that it can all be done by an improvement of the system already existing.

I do not know where this matter is to end. I know that we establish here a somewhat ponderous machinery of justice when we look at it with reference to the number of persons for whom it is intended. The number of our citizens in China and Japan engaged in trade I suppose must be very small. It has not been stated here. I know that the interests of our citizens in China and Japan are not small; but the number of citizens I imagine must be few. Now, for the number of our citizens in China we establish, if I am not mistaken, by this bill two courts, two judges with salaries of $5,000 each, with clerks and marshals and deputy clerks and deputy marshals, with court-houses and prisons; and so in Japan, one judge with a like salary of $5,000, with a marshal and deputy marshals, a clerk and deputy clerks, a court-house and a prison.

It seems to me that we may well pause and see to what extent this system is likely to be extended if we take this initial step. Will our citizens in other ports be content with the consular jurisdiction which I believe is maintained in other ports by this bill? Will they be content with a consular authority to pass upon questions of life and property when China and Japan have courts which to all intents and purposes, although the words "of the United States" have been stricken out of the bill, are United States courts; and how can we propose to establish these courts in every port of the East where we shall obtain any considerable foothold for commerce?

It seems to me that the inauguration of this system is of such doubtful policy, that we can so little see the extent to which it may be enlarged and extended, and so clear that all that is necessary to be done may be done now by the improvement of our present judicial consular system, that I can not feel that it would be proper for me to support this bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I desire to say but very few words in answer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and that rather to correct a misconception of fact which was confirmed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. I find in the constitution of the British courts—

> There shall be a court styled "Her Britannic Majesty's supreme consular court for the dominions of the Sublime Ottoman Porte."
> There shall be one judge of the supreme consular court. Her majesty's consul-general at Constantinople for the time being shall be the judge, but he shall be appointed to the office of judge by her majesty by special warrant under her royal sign manual.

And I call the attention of the gentleman also to the qualifications prescribed for that consul-general:

> He shall be, at the time of his appointment, a member of the bar of England, Scotland, or Ireland, of not less than seven years' standing, or a subject of her majesty (by birth or naturalization) who has filled the office of legal vice-consul in the Ottoman dominions or the office of law secretary to the supreme consular court.

Mr. INGALLS. That shows plainly——

Mr. PENDLETON. It shows what the qualification of the consul-general may be, and that he is appointed a judge in addition to the consular authority.

Mr. INGALLS. In addition to his functions, but he is at the same time a member of the diplomatic and consular circle, acting as such.

Mr. PENDLETON. I find also that there is a trial by jury in the British system, and that it applies to all criminal cases, and also to civil cases where the amount exceeds £50. I find also that provisions are made by that same authority in many of the matters provided for by this bill, that they refer to prison regulations, to mortgages, bills of sale, and suits by or against foreigners. Afterward the same system then adopted for the Ottoman Porte was extended to other foreign countries.

I have no disposition to protract this argument, but rose merely to correct what I thought was a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that the constitution of the British court at Constantinople, to which the Senator from Ohio has called my attention, in any way makes against what I supposed to be the system; that is, the court is not outside of the consular service. The point I was making was that here we are establishing courts entirely outside and distinct from our consular service. Great Britain in her court at Constantinople keeps all the judicial authority within the consular service and system. The court is styled "Her Britannic Majesty's supreme consular court for the dominion of the Sublime Ottoman Porte." There is to be one judge of the supreme consular court, but her majesty's consul-general at Constantinople for the time being shall be the judge. The fact that he must have special qualifications does not change the theory or the principle upon which justice is administered. It is true that he is appointed to the office of judge by her majesty by special warrant under her royal sign-manual, and must be at the time of his appointment a member of the bar of England, Scotland, or Ireland of not less than seven years' standing. And so we might provide that our consuls who are to be clothed with this judicial authority should be attorneys of seven years' standing in the United States. That would not divorce this judicial system in foreign ports from the consular system; it would still be connected with it. My objection to the bill is that it is doubtful whether Congress has power to erect courts there entirely disconnected from the consular service, and that if it be admitted, it is much more doubtful whether it is good policy to do so.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How shall the vote be taken on the amendments?

Mr. PENDLETON. I suggest that, inasmuch as these amendments are chiefly verbal and in no case were contested, the vote be taken on all the amendments of the Committee of the Whole at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to so taking the vote? The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been three times read, the question is on its passage.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when Mr. WALKER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] on all questions.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of business is now the Calendar under Rule IX. When the Calendar was last proceeded with the bill under consideration under this rule was the bill (S. 399) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

Mr. HOAR. Before that order is proceeded with I ask leave to make a motion in regard to the bankruptcy bill. The bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States is reached on the Calendar under Rule VIII of unobjected cases within one bill, so that it will come up the first thing in the morning undoubtedly for action; but I desire to move at this time that that bill be postponed until the 19th day of March, at 2 o'clock, which will be Wednesday, and that it be made the special order for that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the consideration of the bill known as the bankruptcy bill be postponed until Wednesday, the 19th of March, at 2 o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 399) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill and the report of the committee have been read. The Secretary will again read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Albert H. Emery, of the city and State of New York, in full settlement of all claims, legal or equitable, which he has in any way against the United States on account of the cost of, and the time spent by him and use of, all patents and inventions in designing and constructing the testing-machine built and erected by him for the United States, or otherwise, in any way, on account of said machine, the sum of $200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum is hereby appropriated and made immediately available therefor. Said machine, together with the full right to the use therein of all patents and inventions used in its design and construction, shall belong to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to hear the bill explained by the Senator who reported it. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The report was read at a former session of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Was it read yesterday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On a previous day.

Mr. HOAR. The bill, I think, has twice passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. MORGAN. What does it relate to?

Mr. HOAR. It is for the relief of the inventor of a testing-machine of metals.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; I remember the case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg to say that while the bill, I believe, has passed the Senate once or twice, it has certainly not passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. HOAR. It passed the Senate unanimously once. The last time it passed it passed unanimously. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. COCKRELL. There may have been no yea-and-nay vote called upon it, but I know perfectly well that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and myself never assented to it. I am sure of that fact, because we have both on every occasion stated that we thought the amount was too large, and I think so now. I think it is an extortionate amount to be allowed in this case.

Mr. HARRISON. How much?

Mr. COCKRELL. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HAWLEY. Since the bill was drafted Mr. Emery has taken up his residence in Connecticut. Perhaps the amendment had better be made. I move to strike out "of the city and State of New York" and insert "of Stamford, Conn."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection that amendment will be made.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been three times read, the question is on its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the bill has been before Congress once or twice, and probably the Senators who have been here in former Congresses know all about the facts. So far as I am concerned, not knowing about them, I would be very glad indeed if some Senator who does would explain why it is that we are to appropriate this $200,000. Before I am called upon to vote I should like to know a little more about the history of the case.

Mr. HOAR. This gentleman is a very able mechanic, a very ingenious inventor. He was requested by some high—I have forgotten at this moment what official, whether the Chief of the Army Engineers, or the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Treasury, but some high officer of the Government to endeavor to see if a machine could not be invented which should test with absolute accuracy the strength of materials used in building, in mechanism, in the drawing of burdens, &c. He devoted many years of his life and expended large sums in the pursuit of that mechanism, and he has made one of the most successful and wonderful machines in the world, which for many years has been in the custody of the United States at the arsenal at Watertown, Mass., and persons from far and near take their materials from all over the country to that machine for test. It is a very complicated mechanism which I can not describe in the least. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] who is not now in his seat, when the matter came up in the committee of which he is a member, stated that it had been of very great use to him in his business in his own State.

Mr. Emery paid out $129,000 in actual cash, besides devoting years of service to this public benefit. Of that $129,000, he has received back, I think, $31,500, so that the compensation for his invention, which the United States has now the use of and has taken into its own custody and possession, and for his years of time, is the balance of this appropriation.

The Committee on Claims, many of them, thought a very much larger sum should have been devoted. For myself I think that $300,000 is as small a sum as the man ought to receive. My honorable friend from Tennessee gave it in a former Congress a careful investigation, and while he entirely concurred, and, I believe, indeed made a report concurring, in the result of the committee's conclusions in all other respects, he thought that a smaller sum was sufficient compensation. That has been the only question about which there has been any difference, so far as I know.

The bill passed the Senate two Congresses ago, and in the last Congress it passed the Senate unanimously, without any expression of dissent either as to amount or merits in any form or shape. That is the fact about it so far as I understand. This mechanism I believe will test the exact resisting power of a watch-crystal, or of a bar of iron, or of the strongest rock known in nature, with the most absolute accuracy.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no question that this gentleman has constructed the most perfect testing-machine that the world has seen up to this time, with capacity to test the strength of a cambric needle or a horsehair or the largest bar of iron that can be made. As to that fact the proof was abundantly satisfactory to my mind upon a careful examination of a somewhat voluminous record. I have heretofore opposed, however, the appropriation of $200,000, which has been usually, I believe, if not invariably, the amount specified under the bills that have been introduced. This gentleman, Colonel Emery, made a contract to produce this machine for the sum of $25,000, a sum wholly inadequate, as he afterward found out and as I am positively sure. Some time after the making of this contract and his entering upon the work there was, at his instance or the instance of his friends, an additional appropriation of $6,500, making in all $31,500 that was appropriated by Congress to pay for the production of this machine. It proved wholly inadequate; and, without conferring with Congress, without reporting to Congress, without authority from Congress, he proceeded to produce the machine, it costing him something over, I think, as the proof shows, $100,000 or thereabouts. I will not pretend to be accurate as to the precise amount of money actually expended. He presents a bill made up of money actually advanced, in part of interest at the rate of 7 per cent. paid for the money obtained to carry on his work, and items of allowance for his time, I do not remember at what rate but a reasonably fair, high price, that aggregate somewhere near $200,000.

I have always been willing to reimburse him, but I have always condemned his action in going on with the work, borrowing and using money in perfecting this machine for the Government, without reporting to the Government and having the assent and approval of the Government in the expenditure that he was making. He was paying a pretty high rate of interest for the money that he used, and that interest enters into the make-up of this account, as well as a charge of a reasonably high salary. I do not think the salary charged is perhaps extravagant for a man of his genius and skill.

For these reasons I have never been willing, as I am not now willing, to vote to appropriate the sum of $200,000 mentioned in the bill; but I think every consideration of justice demands that the money actually expended in producing a machine such as he has produced should be refunded to him, and he ought to be left certainly free from loss.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have been quite familiar with this case for a long time, having made Mr. Emery's acquaintance years ago, and having great admiration for his skill as an engineer, and at my solicitation once I spent in a committee-room here two or three hours looking over the drawings of his machine, and I was interested in it as a magnificent mechanical triumph.

By the act approved March 3, 1873, Congress appropriated $25,000 for improved machinery for testing American iron and steel. Under this appropriation the Ordnance Department ordered of A. H. Emery a testing-machine, to be designed and built by him and erected at the Watertown arsenal, Massachusetts.

One reason for this movement and for the board that has made two or three annual reports of tests of iron and steel was that the tables in use by the great engineers and manufacturers were found to be defective and insufficient. The old testing-machines were quite imperfect. The enormous value of correct tables will be recognized by any man familiar with the business, when he remembers that thousands of bridges of various descriptions are constructed of iron, steel, &c., in this country, and reflects on the very great importance of knowing just how much strain any one of the rods in a bridge will bear, how much tension, how much cross-strain it will bear. The engineers all over the country, the great builders, felt that a revision of the standards laid down in the books was absolutely indispensable to the safety of the public in general and to the economy of construction, and hence they asked to have this kind of work done. Just think of the numerous railroad iron and steel bridges, some of which have broken down with most calamitous results, that would not have broken down if there had been such a machine as this to test the rods before they were put into the bridge.

Under the act of 1873 a board was appointed. The President appointed on this board General Q. A. Gillmore, Engineers, United States Army; Col. T. T. S. Laidley, of the Ordnance Bureau; Commander L. A. Beardslee, United States Navy; David Smith, chief engineer, United States Navy; General William Sooy Smith, civilian, civil engineer; A. L. Holley, civilian, civil engineer; R. H. Thurston, civilian, civil engineer. A board of equal eminence could not have been found outside them in the United States, or I might venture to say in any country. They made a contract with Emery after he had been at work upward of a year and a half under his original contract. By the new contract the board required certain additional apparatus, which increased the weight of the machine about 10 per cent., and for this additional apparatus added $6,500 to the original contract price, thus changing the price to be paid from $25,000 to $31,500.

That is all the money he has received. The work went on under this until February, 1879, when the machine was completed and accepted.

He had certain patents. They were all absorbed in this machine; and after the Government accepted it at the close of his five years' work, and when he and his friends had involved themselves very heavily in debt, the Government put it in operation at the Watertown arsenal, and in a bill, which can easily be referred to, provided that anybody should have the use of it by paying the expense of running it, which was $15 or $20 a day. The consequence is that the machine is kept busy by the greatest manufacturers in the country, who can not afford to build such a machine, the like of which never was seen, the like of which does not exist in any other country. It is kept busy, I say, by these distinguished manufacturers in testing small and large rods of iron and steel and giving their exact strength. Having a few specimen rods and bars sent up and tested, the contractor goes on and builds the bridge with greater safety and economy.

What will the machine do? It will take a horse-hair and draw it apart and measure to the finest fraction the strain required to break that horse-hair. It will take a five-inch bar of steel, a round bar of the best steel you can make, clinch it, and draw it gently apart as you would a bit of molasses-candy. Its strainage strength is 800,000 pounds, or 400 tons, and it works with the soundest gentleness. It is a magnificent triumph. This comparatively young engineer has several patents involved in it. He did not stop, so long as he could beg or borrow money, until he finished the machine, working substantially under the direction of this board.

I do not know exactly where the legal questions are; but his debts on the 1st of July will be $180,000, and his five years' work is not counted in that; and we have the best machine in the world, an unapproachable machine, and have taken it to our own uses. There have been several reports made upon this question, elaborate reports. Secretary Ramsey said it was a case that called for Congressional action. Let me cite his words:

> The country is now in possession of the most perfect testing-machine in the world. The use of metals in all kinds of constructions, both private and public, demands so accurate a knowledge of their qualities as can only be determined by just such a machine as this, and its determinations will be of the greatest value to one of the most extensive industries in which our people are engaged.
> It appears to me that liberal action on the part of Congress toward one of our citizens who has lost so much in faithfully carrying out his contract would be but proper and equitable.
> Colonel Laidley and other members of the board, who are thoroughly cognizant of all the facts, name $200,000 as not excessive, "or more than sufficient to pay the contractor for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government."

That was in 1880, to which time his debts had been rolling up, debts incurred in the service I might say of humanity as well as the service of the Government. When this question arose, four years ago, under Secretary Ramsey, he referred it to the Ordnance Department, and the Ordnance Department referred it to Colonel Laidley, who was of the board, with instructions to report upon these questions:

> First. Mr. Emery now claiming compensation from the United States not only for the actual cost to him of the machine over and above the contract price, but for the use of his patents, and for consequential damages caused by the free use of the machine to all persons, as given by Congress, &c.
> Second. Is the amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress, excessive or more than sufficient to compensate Mr. Emery for the losses and allowance on the contract, and for his time and labor and use of patents and damage from the free use of machine, &c., for all or any of these?
> Third. Colonel Laidley will submit any papers bearing on this case.

Colonel Laidley made a careful report upon this reference, and he says in the course of it:

> The act of Congress approved June 20, 1878, which directs that this machine shall be applied to the testing of materials for all persons who may desire to use it upon the payment of the actual cost of making the tests, which action virtually destroys the business of the inventor of building testing-machines, in that no one will purchase a machine when he can have the work of testing done by the Government at less cost than he could do it himself if a machine were furnished to him free of charge, gives the inventor a strong claim for greatly increased damages, and causes the undersigned to modify and increase the sum which in his opinion the Government could well afford to pay for this machine and the losses its action has inflicted.

He goes on to say that when Mr. Emery undertook it he confidently expected to finish it within six months.

When the contractor undertook to build this machine he confidently expected that it would be completed within six months, whereas nearly five years were consumed in its perfection. This is nearly one-third of the entire life of his valuable patents, and involves a loss to him without any fault of his which, though doubtless great, it would be difficult accurately to estimate.

It rarely happens in the development of any new invention that the first construction does more than show what may be accomplished in succeeding efforts. In the present instance, however, so thoroughly were all the details digested and such frequent changes made in drawings before they passed into the hands of the workman, that this first machine forms a marked exception to the general rule, and is more perfect in all its parts than could have been reasonably expected under the terms of the contract. This result, however, has not been accomplished without long and laborious study and a corresponding increase of expense to the contractor. Since the Government is thereby the gainer, it can well afford to offer a substantial compensation therefor. Had the contractor failed to raise the necessary funds to complete the machine in accordance with his high standard of excellence, the undersigned, though conversant with the testing-machines used by the principal nations, knows of none which could have been procured combining all of the desired qualities to the extent of that the United States now possesses. No one who has witnessed the facility of its operation and understood the principles upon which it is based has failed to appreciate and be impressed with the delicacy and accuracy of its determinations. This is a matter of no small importance, since it is to form the standard throughout the country for measuring such strains as are ordinarily determined by testing-machines. Its reputation is not confined to this continent, but wherever a knowledge of its capabilities has extended it reflects credit upon the American name.

Under these circumstances the Government can well afford to be liberal with the contractor and make a fair compensation to him for his great creative power and unremitting labor during the five best years of his life.

The amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress—

That was in 1880—

The amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress, would not, in the judgment of the undersigned, be excessive, or more than sufficient to pay the contractor a fair equivalent for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government, the work performed by him, and the losses sustained during the time that he has given up his undivided energies to this undertaking.

This is fully agreed to by William Sooy Smith, Alexander L. Holley, a great engineer now deceased, and Q. A. Gillmore. There are further elaborate documents in the report made by the committee.

Three years ago a committee was appointed by the American Academy of Sciences to make an award they were authorized to make, the grand medal of honor for the single "exhibit most conducive to human welfare," and after an elaborate examination of this machine they voted to give Emery the grand medal of honor; something very seldom awarded and most heartily awarded in this case. Their report gives a most eloquent description of the machine and speaks of it in the highest terms. At a meeting of the National Society of Mechanical Engineers President Thurston spoke most enthusiastically of the benefits of the invention.

I had the honor of serving under and having the acquaintance and I hope the friendship of General Q. A. Gillmore, who stands at the head of his profession, I had almost said—I hope I will say soon to be made—General of Engineers. I wrote him a private letter, that I might satisfy myself about this matter, and the general says in response:

NEW YORK, February 20, 1882.

DEAR SIR: In the matter of Mr. A. H. Emery's services and time spent in designing and constructing the testing-machine now in use at Watertown arsenal, I respectfully submit that a fair allowance ought to be made for the time which he devoted to this enterprise in addition to the disbursements he made on its account; otherwise, the labor of his life will in great measure be lost to him financially. To produce this machine he not only had to spend the long years which were occupied in its production, but the many previous years of study and very expensive experimental works, before he could possibly produce such a machine as this proves to be. He has not only lost this large amount of time, but by a law passed while he was erecting this machine he has been deprived in great measure of the value of these inventions; the law referred to giving the use of the machine to all persons at merely nominal charges for its use. This necessarily tends to prevent a profitable sale of such machine.

Having in this way deprived his patents of much of their value at home, it would seem to be a very moderate compensation to pay him for the time spent in perfecting and building his first machine.

As a member of the board which secured Mr. Emery's services for this work, and inspected it from time to time, I do not speak at random. It was the opinion of that board—the unanimous opinion I think—that he was the only man in the country capable of designing and constructing a piece of work so perfect in its action and results and so well adapted to the end in view.

Hoping you will excuse this expression of opinion, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Q. A. GILLMORE,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers, Bvt. Maj. Gen., U. S. A.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

I think the machine has been worth millions upon millions of dollars to this Government. It revises for us, revises for the world, the standard tables of tests of all the metals. I think this appropriation is exceedingly reasonable. It will be no profit to him. Four years ago this $200,000 was recommended by the most candid, the best qualified men to whom he could submit it, and there has been four years' interest; though the Government does not allow interest on a claim, it runs up on this man, whom I hope nobody will think of driving a hard bargain with. It is a hard enough bargain to give him simply $200,000; but if you could put him back in the position he was, with possession of all these patents, he would probably ask no better fortune.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, after the very full and exhaustive argument of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] I do not know that it is at all necessary that I should take up the time of the Senate; but as one of the Committee on Claims it became my duty to investigate the claim of A. H. Emery for pay for this machine. I confess that when the case first came to me and I found that Colonel Emery was under contract with the Government to supply a certain machine for the sum of $25,000, which sum was afterwards increased to $31,500, and that after the performance of that contract he asked at the hands of the Government $200,000, I doubted somewhat whether such a report as this should be made by the committee; but investigation caused me to follow in the lead of several of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to recommend to the Committee on Claims, as had been recommended by the Secretary of War, by the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau, and several committees composed of the best engineers of the country, that this sum should be paid.

I do not understand, Mr. President, that those who oppose the passage of this bill oppose it for any other reason than that they think the amount too high, that perhaps $100,000 or $150,000 would be ample compensation to Mr. Emery for this machine. The facts as disclosed before the committee and as they appear in this lengthy report are substantially these: He did in 1873 contract for the construction of a testing-machine for the Government of the United States. This machine was to be able to perform certain duties. He was about to embark upon an unknown sea in engineering; he was about to enter the region of experimental manufacture. He had certain inventions not yet reduced to practice, and with these he started on his labors. After a year or more of labor and experiment he found that the amount of his contract was entirely inadequate to perform the work that was required of him.

The Congress of the United States in an appropriation bill came to his relief, and $6,500 more was allowed to him to go on with his effort. He was under bonds in the sum of $35,000 to complete this machine, to complete it according to his contract, and had guaranteed that it should perform the tests that such a machine should be required to perform. He expended $31,500. As the Senator from Connecticut suggests, he used of his own means and of the means of his friends until his expenditure in the construction of the testing-machine before it was finished and ready to be turned over to the Government was the sum of $129,000, of which sum he received $31,500, the contract price, from the Government, leaving an actual indebtedness when the machine was finished in the year 1879 of over $90,000.

The Government accepted the machine, took the result of his labor, his time, and his inventive genius, and the wonderful result stands at the Watertown arsenal to-day as a monument to American invention, to the best of American inventive genius, and is said to be the best testing-machine in the world. Its wonderful power has been described. With its delicate hands it will take the horse-hair and show the tension that is required to break it, or seizing in its colossal grasp the heaviest girder that may be used in a public or private building will show the exact amount of strain by pounds necessary to rend its molecules one from the other.

I say the Government accepted this machine, it uses it to-day; uses it not only for its own purposes but for the uses and purposes of any man who may see fit to apply at the Watertown arsenal and be permitted to bring his girder or his steel rod, and the pay to the United States for the use of the machine for private purposes is simply the cost of the experiment.

What is the result of this action? The Government having taken the machine, I submit that it should pay for it by perhaps some rule approaching that of quantum meruit. Now, what would be the rule? If this case was one that could be taken into the courts of the country and this man recover upon the basis of quantum meruit, it would be the value of his work, the expenditure that was necessary to construct the machine, the value of the time employed, and not only that, but the value of the invention, the use of which to this inventor has been utterly destroyed by the action of the Government. So long as this expensive machine exists and is open to the use of private individuals, no private individual, no corporation will give an order for the construction of one of similar character. Therefore these valuable inventions that have aroused the admiration of the engineering world are rendered utterly valueless to this American inventor.

I say that $200,000 is none too much to pay. It refunds to him the cost of construction; it pays him in part for the months and years of time which he spent in constructing the machine. For eight years he labored upon the machine itself, probably ten or twelve years upon the apparatus and upon the inventions necessary to its perfection.

In addition to that it is proposed to pay to him the value of those inventions, not on the basis of what they may be worth to the United States, but what they are worth to this inventor; and I hazard the assertion, Mr. President, that if Colonel Emery had gone across the water with these valuable inventions and said, "Here is what I have to sell," the European governments would gladly have given him twofold the amount mentioned in this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Is this invention patented in foreign countries?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think not.

Mr. BLAIR. Is there any reason why a patent can not be obtained in foreign countries?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is too late now.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the fact as to foreign patents having been obtained by this inventor?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no definite knowledge. My impression is that he devoted himself to this work here and did not think of paying any attention to getting any patents abroad; but I do not know that that is the case. The Government claimed his work, and took it itself; virtually confiscated it.

Mr. BLAIR. This particular machine, I understand. But is it patented in this country?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. There are several patents connected with it.

Mr. BLAIR. They are the property of Colonel Emery?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. They are, but nobody can afford to expend thousands of dollars to build another machine.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that; but it seemed to me very strange that so valuable an invention should not have been patented abroad, so that a foreign market should be open to this man, as it certainly ought to be.

Mr. HAWLEY. I doubt whether it is patented abroad, but I will say that I think there are some modifications of it on which he will yet make some money, and if you do not pay him for it fully, he has simply lost several of the most important years of his life.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator must not understand that I ask the questions through opposition to the bill. I desire to know the facts as they are. It seems to me that a machine of this very great value and extraordinary power could be constructed upon a smaller scale and passed into the market for private use, and be a source of very considerable income to the inventor, even in his own country; and most certainly so valuable an invention as this should have been patented abroad and should have been made available to this American citizen.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think he can get some profit from some smaller adaptations.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that during the time of the construction of this machine Colonel Emery was approached by many private corporations in this country who anticipated the building of testing-machines. But when the action of the Government was taken confiscating the patents in this country for the use of the public, no corporation and no individual gave an order for a testing-machine, and it is not likely that any will so long as the use of the machine can be had from the Government at simply the cost of operating it for the special experiments parties propose to have undertaken.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand precisely what is meant by the suggestion that the Government confiscated the invention. I understand how the construction of this machine under the eye and direction and control of the Government would make the machine constructed Government property. I understand very well how the expenditures of this man ought to be remunerated, that the Government should pay, and pay liberally, for the use of this extraordinary machine; but I do not understand how the Government has any power to confiscate the use of the invention if it can be made available outside of Government purposes.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will very gladly answer the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire by calling his attention to the act of June 20, 1878. This was when the machine was nearly finished and ready for use. Congress upon that date enacted:

> That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause the machine built for testing iron and steel to be set up and applied to the testing of iron and steel for all persons who may desire to use it, upon the payment of a suitable fee for each test; the table of fees to be approved by the Secretary of War, and to be so adjusted from time to time as to defray the actual cost of the tests as near as may be.

It was by reason of that act of Congress that this machine has been thrown open to the public use at the mere cost to those using it of the actual expense of the test.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will permit me to say that I am as much in the dark as before. Such a statute most certainly must be unconstitutional if it undertakes to confiscate the private right of this inventor. If he has a contract with the Government permitting this thing to be done that is another matter, and it would undoubtedly form the basis of valuable consideration, which we should by this bill or otherwise pay to him.

Mr. MANDERSON. As I understand it, his contract was to make for the Government a testing-machine that would do certain work. He performed his contract under the circumstances that I have narrated, and the Congress of the United States declare by this act that that testing-machine, thus capable, should be used by all citizens of the United States upon their payment of simply the cost of the test. Now, it seems to me, even if the position of the Senator from New Hampshire is correct, that it would be most unfair in the Congress of the United States, after this act, thus, as I say, virtually destroying the value of the invention to him, to compel this inventor to proceed in the courts of the country for the purpose of enforcing his rights. We have this machine, we use it for our own purposes, and we permit private parties to use it to the utter destruction of the value of any patents that have been issued upon the mechanical principles involved in its use.

A word as to the character of the use of this machine by private parties. I say that it is as important to the interests of the country that private parties should be permitted to use this machine at simply the cost of the test as it is important that the Government itself should use it. It is most important for Government use in the construction of its public buildings. We are about to embark, I am glad to say, upon an era of ship-building in this country. We are about to take the Navy of the United States from the slough of despond and place it upon the broad ocean of hope. We are about to build our roomy ships, our armored cruisers, and I say it is important to this country that the plated armor that is to protect those ships from the shot of the enemy should be placed within the testing grasp of this machine; that the guns with which we propose to load these ships should be similarly tested; that the gun-carriages should show their resisting force and power. I say it is as important that private individuals or private corporations proposing the construction of buildings to which human life shall be trusted, proposing the construction of bridges for railway and roadway purposes, should have the use of this testing-machine. I think the legislation of Congress was most wise when it provided in 1878 that for the mere cost of the tests any man might take his material and subject it to the careful recording hand of this wonderful engine.

I do not believe that the amount which the committee propose to pay to Colonel Emery is one dollar too large, and I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Nebraska, before he takes his seat, tell me whether the estimate of $129,000, as the cost of the machine, includes any compensation to Mr. Emery for any part of his time or is it the actual expenditure of cash?

Mr. MANDERSON. The amount of $129,000 that is stated gives to him during the time of the construction of the machine a compensation, I think, of $4,000 a year as a civil engineer.

Mr. COCKRELL. Five thousand dollars, is it not?

Mr. MANDERSON. I thought it was $4,000. It may be that the Senator is right, and that it was $5,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply wanted to make the point that in the cost of the machine as estimated and as spoken of by the Senator this claimant was receiving $5,000 per annum for his services; and the amount now claimed is not for his services, because that is all included. Every dollar on earth that he expended and all his time and his labor are included in the $119,000. The balance is a gratuity pure and simple, nothing less and nothing more. That is all there is of it. Here are the records.

Mr. Emery made this invention of a testing-machine. The United States Government applied to him to purchase one and to know his terms and his conditions, and he replied offering one at $25,000. That was his price, his own fixed price. The Government accepted it, and he commenced the construction of the work under the contract he made at his own price and on his own terms. It was to have been completed within a very short time. It was not completed within that time. Various delays occurred. Finally there was a board appointed, and it was proposed to make a change in the machine. The board and Mr. Emery fixed the price of the change at $6,500. That was the voluntary contract price made between the board and a responsible, intelligent, sane man representing his own interests.

Mr. HOAR. But was it not the price of a thing to be invented?—and of course both sides understand what that means; that it is a mere estimate. It was not the price of a man saying, "I will build a ship," or "I will build a house," or deliver a lot of goods at a certain price. It was his expectation to be able to invent delicate mechanism.

Mr. COCKRELL. He had already invented it.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. And had a patent right.

Mr. HOAR. He invented it as he went along.

Mr. COCKRELL. And he proposed to construct his invention.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the following statement in the report of the committee:

> From statements of the claimant which there is no reason to doubt it appears that his inventions embodied in this machine were for the most part matured prior to the date when the machine was ordered, to wit, the 24th of December, 1873.

Mr. COCKRELL. He had his merchandise in market for sale, and the United States asked him his price for his merchandise, his inventive genius, and his capital, protected by a patent. The United States asked him his price. He said, "It is $25,000." The United States said, "We will give you $25,000." Under that contract he undertook the construction of the machine, and when a change was necessary the United States said to him, "What shall be the cost of this change?" They agreed upon $6,500. That was the price agreed upon, and that made $31,500.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to continue the reading where the Senator from Kansas left off?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure, as a matter of course.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from Kansas had pursued the reading a little further he would have read this:

The papers show that at that time no design of the machine had been made, and that the claimant pursued with untiring industry and skill the designing, constructing, testing, and perfecting of this machine, which proved to be an unexpectedly difficult and expensive task.

The inventions had been made, but they had not been applied to this machine or to any other machine.

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course no machine had been constructed. If there had been the United States would probably have purchased one.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is very likely so.

Mr. COCKRELL. But he said, "I have got an invention for a machine of this character; here is my patent right; it is for sale; how much will you give me?" Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HOAR. I wish further——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. On that point, in answer to what the Senator from Kansas read, here is the certificate of Colonel Laidley, colonel of ordnance, signed also by Engineers Smith and Holley and General Gillmore:

When the contractor undertook to build this machine—

Which is the time when the Senator says he made this offer—

he confidently expected that it would be completed within six months, whereas nearly five years were consumed in its perfection. This is nearly one-third of the entire life of his valuable patents, and involves a loss to him, without any fault of his, which, though doubtless great, it would be difficult accurately to estimate.

So that, if I am not trespassing upon the Senator's great courtesy, the Senator will see that what I said is true. He had got several different inventions which he expected to combine and utilize in this machine. He got the general idea as it has been carried out, so that he did say to the United States, "I can do this in six months for $25,000;" but he found, as inventors again and again find, that when they think they see in the mind's eye the whole thing perfect and complete, it requires years of patient toil and effort and the exercise of genius to complete it. Therefore, instead of six months and $25,000, it cost him five years and $119,000, including compensation for his time, however, in that sum.

Who ever heard of holding an inventor who thought he could finish a machine in a given time for a given sum to the ordinary rules by which you hold a man who undertakes to build a house? Of course, if you are talking about legal claim, the same doctrine applies; but we are talking about the duty of the Government to a man who has rendered nearly the greatest public benefaction of the age at its request and for its benefit, the Government having taken the result of his life into its own hands.

Neither the Senator from Missouri nor the Senator from Tennessee has ever dreamed of settling this case on the principle the Senator from Missouri is arguing it on. They fixed a smaller sum than the rest of their associates on the Claims Committee when they were on that committee, and smaller than the unanimous Claims Committee now fix, but they do not hold this man to the law of contract. The Senator will not undertake to sit down and take the doctrine he preaches and draw a corollary from that and say, "That is the sum I am going to pay this man." Both those Senators agree with the committee in the principle, which is that this man ought to have a liberal and just and fair compensation for his inventions, for his expenses, with some regard to the great benefit which he has conferred on mankind. We all agree to that. Nobody in the Senate will get up and apply to this case the doctrine which the Senator argues.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very much obliged to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts for undertaking to make a speech for the distinguished Senator from Tennessee and myself. I rather think, though, that we are able to present our own views upon the legality and equity of this question.

I am taking this claimant upon his own terms. I am trying to sift this down and see what is the pretension upon which the claim of $200,000 is based. I said he had his merchandise, his invention, his patent, and he offered it to the United States for $25,000; that the United States accepted it, and he agreed to finish it in six months. He did not do it. Why? Was it the fault of the United States? Certainly not. It was because he did not have what he represented he had. He did not have a perfected invention. He had to have time and delay on the part of the United States in order to enable him to carry out what he represented he could do in six months. The United States gave him the delay, and for that delay he wants compensation. That is what it is.

We come to another question. A change was to be made, and he agreed to that at $6,500. Did he honestly think that that was a sufficient remuneration and compensation? If he did not, why did he agree to the contract? Was it for the purpose of coming in here and pressing a claim before Congress and appealing to the sympathies of the Senate and of Congressmen?

I wish to call attention to one fact in connection with this claim. It grows. It has grown enormously. But a short time ago this claimant only asked for $70,000. The board with Colonel Laidley at the head of it only recommended $70,000 as the limit, in addition to what he had been paid. Now, let us look at this. Remember that in this $119,000 the claimant is allowed $5,000 per annum, and interest upon it, as compensation for his time and services; as much as any Senator draws on this floor. Five thousand dollars a year is computed in the actual cost of the machine; and now he wants something more.

I wish to go back to the report in the Forty-fifth Congress. I hold in my hand Executive Document No. 68, Forty-fifth Congress, third session. It was when this claim was just beginning to come up. The Chief of Ordnance referred to Col. T. T. S. Laidley, president of the board, on February 13, 1879, this whole question, with these two questions propounded:

First. What is the total cost of machine to the contractor?
Second. What would be a just and equitable amount to be appropriated by Congress for the relief of the contractor?

Two simple propositions. Now let us see what the answer was by Colonel Laidley:

WATERTOWN ARSENAL, February 15, 1879.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Ordnance with the report:
First. That the total cost of the machine to the contractor is, as he states, over $100,000.

And that $100,000 includes his salary of $5,000 a year.

Second. That what would be a just and equitable amount to be appropriated by Congress for the relief of the contractor is a question which was not discussed by the board at its last meeting, and its opinion can not be given. The undersigned can only give his individual judgment on this question, about which there will probably be considerable difference of opinion. He does not think that the United States should alone bear this burden, but in consideration of the fact that the contractor was greatly deceived in regard to the expense of building the machine and the difficulties he would encounter in its construction, and that the machine is in every respect a most superior one, far surpassing in accuracy all others now known, and better than the board had any right to expect at the time of making the contract, the undersigned deems the sum of $45,000 not greater than justice and equity to the contractor would demand, and he accordingly recommends relief to that amount.

T. T. S. LAIDLEY,
Colonel of Ordnance, President of the Board.

Forty-five thousand dollars was the judgment of T. T. S. Laidley in 1879. General Benét forwarded to the Secretary of War this report to him and said:

The sum recommended by the president of the board is not less than $45,000, and by three other members of the board is $70,000, which if appropriated and paid to the contractor will make the machine cost $76,500, or $101,500, according to the amount determined on.
These are the recommendations of a majority of the board.

I read now from the report of A. L. Holley to General Benét. He says:

I believe that the contractor could not have spent less than $100,000 to produce this machine.

In reply to the interrogatory what would be an equitable compensation, he says:

The contractor asks for $70,000 to reimburse him for losses on this contract. I would recommend this appropriation for his relief, and I will also add that, as the board did not intend that the machine should be made without a reasonable profit, I would also have recommended, had the contractor asked it, that he should be properly remunerated for his time as well as for his disbursements.

But remember that in his account he is getting $5,000 per annum for his time.

I hold in my hand the second part of the same executive document. The contractor asks for $70,000 to reimburse him for his losses in the contract. That was in the Forty-fifth Congress. We come to the Forty-sixth Congress and we find that this same matter is referred to the same board. It is addressed to the President and the claim continues to grow. Now, what is said there? The Secretary of War says:

Colonel Laidley and other members of the board, who are thoroughly cognizant of all the facts, name $200,000 as not excessive—

Or what?

or more than sufficient to pay the contractor—

For what?

for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government.

A gratuity, as I said in the beginning, pure and simple. He received full compensation in the $119,000, and that is every dollar that he ought to receive. That $119,000 is made up how? By compounding interest at 7 per cent. semi-annually. That is the way he runs it up to $119,000. He counts his own salary $5,000, and interest at 7 per cent., compounded every six months, and so for all the expenditures in the same way. We are asked to come in here and vote a gratuity pure and simple of $81,000 to a man to whom we have paid $5,000 a year salary, and not for all his time, for he has had his time occupied in other matters. He has been simply superintending this machine, and the Government for that alone has been allowing him $5,000. There is not one particle of justice or equity or mercy or anything in any amount in this bill over $119,000.

Mr. President, is the bill in a condition that an amendment can be offered to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it is not.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to state that the beneficiary of this bill, Mr. Emery, is still the superintendent of the machine at the Watertown arsenal?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose so, as they still keep on speaking about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. He has nothing in the world to do with it. The Government took it out of his hands years ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Government received the machine some time ago, I know.

Mr. HAWLEY. He has nothing to do with the management of it at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. But the interest is still going on. The machine was received in 1879.

Mr. HAWLEY. He has nothing to do with it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is not in a condition to be amended, the question being on its final passage, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading so that we may have a vote upon an amendment reducing the sum to $120,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to prolong this debate, for I suppose the Senate is substantially in possession of the facts. Three committees of the Senate, excepting on one occasion two gentlemen who differed on some points, have reported for this, I believe unanimously. It has been reported upon favorably in the House; it has had the approval of several Secretaries of War.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon; I challenge the Senator to show the approval of any Secretaries of War. They transmitted the documents here, but there never has been an approval of the payment of $200,000 by a Secretary of War.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let the Senator from Connecticut turn to page 4 of the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the communication of Secretary Ramsey right before me. Said Secretary Ramsey:

This is a case that calls for Congressional action. These papers show that it is one deserving favorable consideration.

The country is now in possession of the most perfect testing-machine in the world.

Then comes in what I believe I read before. He says further:

It appears to me that liberal action on the part of Congress toward one of our citizens who has lost so much in faithfully carrying out his contract would be but proper and equitable.

Colonel Laidley and other members of the board, who are thoroughly cognizant of all the facts, name $200,000 as not excessive, "or more than sufficient to pay the contractor for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government."

I respectfully recommend reference of these papers to Congress with request for speedy and favorable action.

I take that to be a commendation of the machine and a warm commendation of the enterprise.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not take it to be such.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, one or two other questions of fact. We are not driving a hard bargain, I take it, in this matter; we are not making an ordinary settlement of a book account in a corner grocery. This gentleman had been for some years at work upon the invention before he was employed by the Government. He had expended large sums of money in perfecting the machine. He had taken out several patents. The drawings, however, were not completed. A part of his time when he was employed went to the completion and perfecting of detailed drawings. Then the plans were altered. That made an additional expense which was not covered by the $6,500, and then, as the engineers say, it proved to be an unexpectedly difficult and expensive task, and, as the committee say elsewhere:

In the plans designed by Mr. Emery he adopted new principles, in the working out of which he met, as is always the case under such circumstances, with great and unlooked-for difficulty.

All the while he was told to go on with the machine and complete it. As to the sum that he expended there were different estimates, but I think the Senator from Missouri misunderstood what was said in 1880, at least, when Colonel Laidley, to whom the question was referred, reported thus:

The inclosed papers, which have been carefully examined by the undersigned, show that the testing-machine invented and constructed by Mr. A. H. Emery for the Government has cost him much more than had been supposed in February, 1879, when, without going into an examination of books and papers, the cost was set down at $100,000.

He said it cost much more than was supposed when the estimate was put down at $100,000, besides the fact that this account does not include his time and the heavy expense that he was subjected to before the Government employed him, which can not properly perhaps come directly into it as part of the charge against the Government, but which is nevertheless involved by the practical confiscation of the machine. In addition to that, after he had finished this work, working years longer than he expected, all the while encouraged and stimulated, first by the Ordnance Department, and then by this great engineering board who had employed him—after all that, which embraced five years of actual labor and three or four years of previous study expended on the invention, the Government accepts it, to be sure knowing his claim upon the Government for expended moneys, and then provides that anybody in the world may use the machine who will pay for the manual labor of running it, and of course nobody in the world builds another one. During those five years his board bill is in this account. He calls it $5,000. That is a small salary for him. He is worth two or three times that amount. He was worth then more than $5,000. I think this Government will do something like what honor requires, and give not one cent more than justice calls for, in giving him the sum provided for in the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I am somewhat interested in this claim and in the passage of this bill, because I want to see how our Government is to treat the great inventors of this country. Here is a man who according to these reports, who according to the confession of all Senators who have investigated the claim, is entitled to rank with Watt and Fulton and Morse and Siemens and the other great inventors who by their inventive skill and genius have done so much to develop the industrial progress of the world during the last fifty years.

The Government comes to this man, who has an inchoate, imperfect invention, and asks him to make one of his great machines. He toils upon it for five years and expends upon it—I speak roughly—$100,000 more than the Government proposes to pay him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ninety-eight thousand dollars, by his own statement.

Mr. PLATT. I speak in round numbers. The Government thereupon, without paying him that $100,000, takes his machine, which nobody else can use, and throws it open to the use of every individual in this country who chooses to use it and to reap its benefits. Then it allows him for five years longer to stagger along with this debt of $100,000 upon his shoulders, and chills every inventive faculty which the man possesses. I wonder that it has not killed as well as chilled the inventor. What more he might have done for mankind, what other great inventions he might have perfected which should have aided the already wonderful development of this country if the Government had not left him to worry and stagger along under this load of debt which it ought to have compensated him for, we do not know; but it seems to me that it is not the treatment which a great inventor should receive at the hands of his government. Under such circumstances Congress should not stop to higgle and haggle as to whether he should have the exact amount expended or the fair, moderate value of his patent and his invention.

Mr. FAIR. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress I was assigned by the Committee on Claims to an examination of this case, and I made thorough inquiry into the history of this machine so as to be able to make a report upon the claim. I worked upon the subject three weeks, and I think I understand the machine perfectly, while there are many here who do not. That this is a just and meritorious claim, in my opinion, there can be no doubt. The machine has undergone many changes from the original design; parts had to be made over and over again, but it is now a very perfect machine, and I believe it is worth to the Government and to the people of this country more than twenty times what it is proposed to pay the inventor by the bill.

If I were accustomed to speaking I might say more. I have said enough to inform the Senate what my opinion is on a careful examination of the subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will ask the Senator if he has not himself practically tested the machine in building railroads and bridges?

Mr. FAIR. The machine is set apart by the Government for the use of any citizen. Any one may take his bridge or other iron there and test it, paying the expense of running the machine during the time the test is being made. Many people do that. I think the machine is nearly constantly in use; at least I know that it was some time ago. It is a machine of great value, and any one who will examine it will be convinced of that fact.

Mr. VOORHEES. This case seems to have a very considerable history. There is a great deal due, in my estimation (perhaps not so much in the estimation of some other Senators), to a faithful examination of a case before a committee. There is a great deal due to the integrity and intelligence of gentlemen of this body as well as the House of Representatives.

I find that this claim was before the Forty-sixth Congress and received a favorable report from the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives at that time. I find that it received another favorable report from the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress. I find also that the Committee on Claims of this body in the Forty-sixth Congress reported in its favor. There are three favorable reports upon this claim in the past. The present report which we are now considering makes the fourth time that committees of Congress have reported favorably in this matter. There is a great deal due to the fact that the claim has had the consideration of some thirty or forty members of Congress at both ends of the Capitol, always reaching the same favorable conclusion.

Let us look a little further and see what else we find. The Senator from Missouri insisted that Colonel Laidley placed a proper compensation at one time at $45,000. It is stated in the report:

One member of the board then recommended the payment of not less than $45,000 additional compensation, while five other members of the board recommended the payment of $70,000 additional, which latter amount, added to the contract price, would only have reimbursed him for actual outlay as then estimated, without any compensation for his own time and skill or for the use of his inventions.

After that, however, as the report shows, by order of the War Department this matter was again referred to Colonel Laidley with specific interrogatories, and at the bottom of page 4 will be found the following:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 26, 1880.

Respectfully referred to Col. T. T. S. Laidley, president of the late board on steel and iron, for remark.

First. Mr. Emery now claiming compensation from the United States not only for the actual cost to him of the machine over and above the contract price, but for the use of his patents, and for consequential damages caused by the free use of the machine to all persons, as given by Congress, &c.

Second. Is the amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress, excessive or more than sufficient to compensate Mr. Emery for losses and allowance on the contract, and for his time and labor and use of patents and damage from the free use of machine, &c., for all or any of these?

Third. Colonel Laidley will submit any papers bearing on this case.

By order of the Chief of Ordnance.

S. C. LYFORD, Major of Ordnance.

In response to that reference made by Major Lyford to Colonel Laidley Colonel Laidley made a full statement, the closing part of which alone it is necessary now to read. After showing that upon subsequent investigation and upon the fact that the Government had practically destroyed the value of his patent, the original sum as quoted by the Senator from Missouri, $45,000, was totally insufficient to compensate him, Colonel Laidley winds up his statement as follows:

The amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress, would not, in the judgment of the undersigned, be excessive, or more than sufficient to pay the contractor a fair equivalent for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government.

There the Senator from Missouri stopped. I will show you what else he said this $200,000 would pay for.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. VOORHEES. Wait until I get through.

Mr. COCKRELL. I read every bit of that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can relieve the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat once more the statement on which I rely. I wish to do entire justice to the Senator from Missouri. Let me do so without interruption.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here it is.

Mr. VOORHEES. Colonel Laidley, in his report, says:

The amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress, would not, in the judgment of the undersigned, be excessive, or more than sufficient to pay the contractor a fair equivalent for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government, the work performed by him, and the losses sustained during the time that he has given up his undivided energies to this undertaking.

That makes a much more complete rounding out of what is due to the man than appeared from the reading with which the Senator from Missouri indulged the Senate. Now I will show where the discrepancy exists. The Secretary of War on this subject says this—not Colonel Laidley, but the Secretary of War undertakes to make a report in 1880; and he says:

Colonel Laidley and other members of the board, who are thoroughly cognizant of all the facts, name $200,000 as not excessive, "or more than sufficient to pay the contractor for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government."

Simply, the Secretary of War did not fully restate the grounds on which Colonel Laidley had fixed $200,000 as due; he only stated a part of Colonel Laidley's statement, and the Senator from Missouri read the restatement made by the Secretary of War, which is short, very far short of Colonel Laidley's statement. Colonel Laidley himself says that this $200,000 would not, in his judgment, "be excessive or more than sufficient to pay the contractor a fair equivalent for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government, the work performed by him, and the losses sustained during the time that he has given up his undivided energies to this undertaking."

I repeat, Mr. President, not only has the case never been touched by a committee except with a favorable report, but it has never been touched in the Executive Departments without receiving a most generous response, not only as to the merits of this great invention, but likewise as to its value and as to what would be a fair remuneration to the inventor. The Senator from Missouri said he challenged the contrary to be shown, that the Secretary of War had never approved of this claim. Why, sir, on the contrary——

Mr. COCKRELL. I said of the $200,000 claim.

Mr. VOORHEES. The report of the Secretary of War of November 19, 1880, referring to the report of the Chief of Ordnance, says:

He reports the successful operation of the United States testing-machine at the Watertown arsenal, adding that this machine is considered the most perfect testing-machine in the world; equally able to test a single hair and the largest column or specimens by either tension or compression with any load desired, from one to eight hundred thousand pounds, being of any length from one inch to thirty feet. Its determinations are of great value to the Departments of the Government and to the scientific and industrial interests of the whole country. The memorial of its inventor, asking for additional compensation and reimbursement, is commended to the favorable consideration of Congress.

Then the Secretary of the Treasury in transmitting the estimates of deficiencies in appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1881, includes in the estimates of the Secretary of War $200,000 to settle this claim. Here is what the Secretary of the Treasury, in transmitting the estimates of the Secretary of War, says:

To pay to Albert H. Emery, of the city and State of New York, in full settlement of all claims, legal or equitable, which he has in any way against the United States on account of the cost of the testing-machine built and erected by him for the United States, including the time spent by him in designing and constructing the said machine, together with the use of all patents and inventions used therein: Provided, That said machine, together with the full right to the use therein of all patents and inventions used in its design and construction, shall belong to the United States.

There the Secretary of War's estimate of $200,000 is transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I can only repeat myself when I say that from the beginning to the end, from the incipiency of the history of this claim until the present moment, it swells upon the regard of every man that looks into it; it magnifies itself when it is examined; there is nothing like it to-day beneath the sun in all the civilized world, and there is no other such machine in existence. This gentleman has added one more proud triumph to the inventive genius which America has so long and so steadily displayed; and instead of caviling and carping about this amount, to my mind it is not only fair and reasonable, but it is small in comparison with the great results which are to be achieved by this invention.

Mr. President, this claim comes here this afternoon with no minority report. The members of the Committee on Claims, a sifting, careful, conscientious, and intelligent committee, report it here unanimously. I shall vote to sustain them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was ordered to its third reading.

The motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] had to leave the Senate Chamber a few moments ago, and asked me to pair with him on this bill. I should certainly vote "nay" but for the pair, and I understood him that he would vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]; otherwise I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 15; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 6, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHELLEY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman will yield for a moment to permit me to ask to have some printing done for the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no discretion if the gentleman insists upon the regular order. The Chair is informed, however, that the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to ask a correction.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have a correction made in a bill which has been erroneously printed. I ask simply to withdraw the bill (No. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army, with the report No. 330.

The SPEAKER. To be recommitted to the committee?

Mr. LYMAN. No, sir; to be reprinted, there being a clerical error in the printing of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be ordered to be printed as corrected.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

FUNDS IN THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information as to the amount of money in the Treasury; for what purposes the same is held; and how much thereof, if any, could now be applied to the payment of the public debt; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF REBATE ON TOBACCO, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House inquiring whether any additional clerical force is necessary to facilitate the payment of the rebate on tobacco, snuff, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE BODY, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting memorial of certain members of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, protesting against the action of the secretary of that Territory in refusing to administer the oath of office to members-elect; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WASHBURN, from Tuesday, 4th instant, for ten days, on account of important business.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. FRANCISCO A. MANZANARES, a Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, vice Tranquilino Luna.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for the purpose of further considering the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

For completing the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch-boat authorized by act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, as follows: Chicago, $349,133.45; Boston, $231,853.28; Atlanta, $231,853.27; Dolphin, $108,660; in all, $921,500.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to offer an amendment, to come in after the word "cents," at the end of line 306.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will forward his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 306, after the word "cents," insert:
Provided, That such vessels shall have full sail power.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment. I do not understand what it is.

Mr. THOMAS. I will explain the need for it. The first appropriation bill authorizing the building of these steel cruisers was the act of August 5, 1882. By that act it was provided——

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman give way for a moment? There is so much confusion in the hall that I was unable to hear clearly his amendment, and I ask before he proceeds that it be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. THOMAS. As I was about to state, Mr. Chairman, by the act of August 5, 1882, it was provided that these new cruisers shall be supplied with full steam power as well as full sail power. By that act there was authorized to be built two vessels, one of a little less than 6,000 tons displacement, and one of 4,100 tons displacement, which latter is the Chicago, as named in the act making appropriations for 1884 and the present appropriation bill. By the act of March 3, 1883, there was authorized to be constructed the vessels known as the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin, namely, three cruisers and one dispatch-boat. That bill provided that "no such vessels shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract and with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board, and in all respects in accordance with the act of August 5, 1882, except as herein modified."

Now, sir, the Navy Department in construing the law said because the naval advisory board had sent a letter in which they had recommended the building of certain vessels, among which was the dispatch-boat the Dolphin with two-thirds sail power, therefore they had a right to change the direct requirements of the act of 1882; and under the specious plea of putting two-thirds sail power they have not given the Chicago the power to go three miles before a fresh breeze and she could not get off a lee-shore at all.

I am borne out in that statement by the Admiral of the Navy, who in his report says these vessels ought to have full sail power and will be perfectly useless unless full sail power be given.

Then they should be changed in other respects. They have standing smoke-stacks, which will cut off nearly one-third of the proposed sail power. Then it must be remembered we have no foreign coaling station, and in case of war with any of the great powers, coal having been declared a contraband of war, we have no opportunity of buying coal at all at foreign stations, and these vessels will be entirely helpless without coal and unable to use their machinery.

Therefore the Admiral of the Navy, the Chief Constructor of the Navy, and the sailor men of the Navy who go to sea and know what they are talking about, say these vessels should not be made merely steam floating machines, but should be effective cruisers in time of peace, and should have sail power to carry them along instead of using expensive coal.

The proposition must commend itself to the common sense and judgment of all men. There are places on the Pacific coast where coal costs $1.50 and $2 a bushel. The Chicago only carries nine hundred and sixty tons of coal and can only run six days on that at full speed.

I hope the advisory board will be compelled to comply with the law as it was understood by Congress and as it was enacted by Congress, and that these vessels shall have full sail power, so that they can reserve their supplies of coal to be used in an emergency, and not use them in every-day cruises when they can as well or better go under sail.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I think the point of order is well taken. This certainly would tend to increase expenditures; at any rate it is not in the line of economy. But I am gratified to find that my friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], speaking from the other side of the House, fortifies the argument which I made yesterday in reference to these cruisers; and that is that under the contract under which they are being constructed and in the mode in which they are being constructed they will prove practical failures. It was for that reason that I hesitated long before I was willing to make an appropriation to complete them. But the gentleman must be aware that the Department, acting under the advice of the advisory board, has entered into the contracts for the completion of these vessels.

Mr. THOMAS. This does not affect these contracts at all.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I do not know whether it does or not. But I know this, if you change these contracts by this legislation at all you open the door for millions of extra charges.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to set the gentleman from New York right as to that.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I can not be interrupted, as I have only five minutes. The contract has been made under the advice of the advisory board and we can not undertake here to alter it. I believe in adhering to the strict letter of the contract and going on and building these vessels, as the United States Government has obligated itself to complete them. If they prove failures, when we come to construct others of a similar class then we will be in a position to correct any faults that may have occurred in the construction of these vessels.

The advisory board created for the purpose of supervising the building of these ships has entered into this contract, and how can we revise its action? I believe myself those vessels should have full sail power. They should be constructed so that they could sail without coal. I admit that is so; but we can not and must not here in our legislation on this subject interfere with those contracts.

Mr. THOMAS. Just one word. This does not affect the contracts at all. There has been no contract for rigging the vessels at all. The spars and the masts are to be built by the Government in the navy-yards. This does not change the contract a particle and does not involve the expenditure of a cent of money, but saves to the Government any amount of money in the cost of fuel. It does not interfere at all with the contracts. There is no contract as to that.

Mr. TALBOTT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois what sail power have these vessels now. Is it two-thirds?

Mr. THOMAS. They have what purports to be two-thirds sail power, but neither the Chicago, the Atlanta, nor the Boston really has one-fourth.

Mr. TALBOTT. They are estimated to have two-thirds sail power?

Mr. THOMAS. The estimate is on a false basis. It is based on 33,000 square feet of sail, when by reason of the standing smoke-stacks the vessels can not use a sail power of more than 24,000 feet.

Mr. TALBOTT. Assuming that they do have but two-thirds sail power, they could navigate with that amount of sail power.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes, after a fashion. But she has not two-thirds sail power; she has but a little more than one-fourth.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then the advisory board can do all that is necessary. We can not legislate in the dark on that subject. We do not know what effect such legislation as is proposed here will have on the contract.

Mr. TALBOTT. The law under which these vessels are authorized to be constructed provides that when any alteration is made in the plan the amount of expenditure necessary to make the alterations shall be agreed upon by the advisory board before it is done.

Mr. THOMAS. But this does not effect any change in the contract for the hull or machinery at all. It relates only to the spars and the rigging, which are to be provided by the Government in its own yards. If we go on in this way we do it in the face of common sense.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then I understand the gentleman to say that he has no confidence at all in the advisory board. If so, then why not abolish it?

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman can not put words in my mouth; I made no such statement as that.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The very party intrusted with the construction and fitting out of these vessels can do that.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is not this debate all out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] raises the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. And I reply to the point of order that my amendment reduces expenditures and does not change existing law, but directs a compliance with the law.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I withdraw the point of order and call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word. I understand that the proposed amendment applies in line 306, and is directed to the Atlanta, and not the Chicago, though some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] apply to all these vessels alike.

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to one thing, and I say frankly that I ask him the question for information. It is whether the particular style of rigging of the Boston and the Atlanta was not adopted with a view to giving greater efficacy to the fire of their heavy guns; and whether the adoption of full sail power in those particular vessels would not imply a considerable change in the construction of the hulls? So far as the Chicago is concerned, there is a difference of theory among naval officers as to whether that vessel should have full sail power or two-thirds sail power. A vessel with full sail power can not steam so fast against the wind. A vessel with two-thirds sail power has an advantage in that respect, though there may be disadvantages in other respects.

That is a question that we can not settle here. All that we ought to do is to hasten these vessels to completion, and if there is found to be any error in their construction that error can be remedied in the case of the next vessels built.

Mr. THOMAS. In answer to the question of the gentleman let me say, in the first place, lest I might have been misunderstood, that the contracts already put out relate only to the hull and the machinery, not to the masts and rigging, which are reserved for the Government to supply hereafter.

As to the Boston and Atlanta, the change here proposed will in no way affect either the hull or the fighting power of those ships. At any time that the vessels are obliged to go into an engagement they can in twenty minutes strip themselves of spars and sails so as to go under steam power; and if there is not room enough on the decks of the vessels for those spars and sails, there is always room enough in the sea, and they can be thrown overboard if necessary to get them out of the way.

It will not cost as much to purchase the extra spars in order to give these vessels full sail power as it will to pay for the coal which they would use in three days. These vessels are supposed to run for fifty years. Their service in battle is the exception; the cruises in peace are the general rule. It is for the purpose of making this economic change that I propose this amendment. It will in no way affect the vessels and their fighting power, and is in the line of economy.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that the theory of the construction of these cruisers was to give them full steam power and also full sail power.

Mr. THOMAS. Those are the express terms of the act of August, 1882.

Mr. RANDALL. But if it is desirable to give them one-third more of sail power, that is a matter of administration, and not, I think, a subject for direct legislation or perhaps instruction by Congress. If the amendment proposed is to be adopted, there ought to be a clause added to it providing that this change may be made in case the Secretary of the Navy and the advisory board shall so approve.

Mr. TALBOTT. I would suggest that the Government at its navy-yards can make the change and give these vessels full sail power at any time.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course it can.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then what is the use of this amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. I want to compel the Navy Department to comply with the law.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the point. For one I do not know enough about the construction of these vessels, whether they should have full sail power or two-thirds sail power, as to feel justified in giving instructions to the Department upon the subject. I prefer to leave the matter to the law as it now exists. If this amendment is to be adopted, it should have a clause requiring the approval of the advisory board and of the Secretary of the Navy; in other words, that if they concur in the propriety of the change it shall be made, and not otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS. My amendment is based upon the statement of the Admiral of the Navy, made in his report, upon the evidence given by the Chief Naval Constructor, from which the gentleman read yesterday.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I am willing to provide that the Chief Naval Constructor shall act in conjunction with the advisory board.

Mr. THOMAS. I think we ought to compel the Department to comply with the law in the interest of economy.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is a dangerous experiment.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Chair will regard the formal amendments as withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] to insert after the words "cents," in line 306, the words "provided that said vessels shall have full sail power."

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 27, noes 77.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 309 insert:
The four pivot-guns of the Chicago to be mounted on Clark's deflective single-gun turrets or V shields, of the same weight as is now allowed for the mounting and armor protection guns.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. If the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] were in his seat he would offer and advocate the amendment I have submitted. Unfortunately he is at his home sick, and therefore I have presented the amendment in his place.

A year ago Congress enacted in the naval appropriation bill this provision:

For investigating and testing the practicability of deflective turrets designed by Passed Assistant Engineer N. B. Clark, $20,000, to be available immediately.

The pending amendment provides for carrying out the same design, not as to deflective turrets, but as to deflective gun-shields. It provides for testing a valuable invention for the purpose of protecting the men who stand behind the guns. That this invention has merit can not be disputed.

The advisory board, in a document presented to the last Congress, said:

The gun-shields presented by Mr. Clark possess decided merits.

The adoption of this amendment will not interfere with existing contracts, as these shields are not to be constructed by contract but will be built by the Government. Hon. B. W. Harris, of Massachusetts, who was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the last Congress, took a great interest in this measure and investigated it fully. It was through his efforts, aided by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], that the provision which I have read was inserted in the naval appropriation bill a year ago. In writing on this subject recently Mr. Harris says:

It was the full intention of the committee to have at least one of the ships built with interior deflective armor, with the guns mounted on V shields.

Admiral Porter says:

I do not hesitate to say that I strongly indorse your system of protecting the men at the guns.
Once get the system introduced, and it will recommend itself.
As I have told you, your system of defense against projectiles is the right one, and no vessel of war can be considered as secure until it is generally adopted.

Rear-Admiral Ammen says:

Your ideas of construction will produce a vessel far better calculated to resist shot and shell than any vessel now afloat, with far less displacement than now exists with heavily plated armored vessels, and at far less cost of construction.

Chief Engineer J. W. King, one of the best educated engineers in the service, who was sent around the globe to investigate matters of this kind, says:

I have no hesitation in saying that the disposition of the armor proposed is the best that has come under my notice.

Mr. Chairman, this is all I have to say in reference to the amendment. I believe it due to the men who have to do the fighting that they should be protected at their posts. This amendment provides simply for testing this invention, which, according to the testimony I have read, promises to be so valuable.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CURTIN], who is much interested in this matter, is absent in consequence of illness. The legislation with reference to the Clark patent originated in the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1883, which contained the following:

For investigating and testing the practicability of deflective turrets designed, by Passed Assistant Engineer N. B. Clark, $20,000, to be available immediately, the investigation and test to be made by the naval advisory board.

I have no individual objection to this amendment, but I want to say for the Department, and particularly for the head of the Ordnance Bureau, Mr. Sicard, that he states this appropriation of $20,000 has been expended or is being expended in this direction.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. The gentleman will allow me to say that the appropriation of $20,000 already made provides for experimenting upon deflective turrets. This amendment provides for testing the gun-shield—a shield behind the gun itself—having no direct reference to the turrets.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been an intimation made that the Department was not expending this money in good faith in the execution of this law.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I did not make it.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to correct that intimation, for I am advised by the Department that patterns have been made at the Washington navy-yard. The target plates, &c., which by Mr. Clark's requirements are to be made of Creuzot steel, were ordered from Messrs. Schneider & Co., October 11, 1883, and are expected to be delivered in April next. I say that in justice to the Navy Department.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Allow me right there to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether by the bill passed March 3 of last year for investigating and testing the practicability of deflective turrets designed by Passed Assistant Engineer N. B. Clark, $20,000, to be available immediately, the investigation and test are to be made by the naval advisory board?

Mr. RANDALL. The last clause of the law is that the investigation and test shall be made by the naval advisory board, and what I have stated has been in justice to the Navy Department.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The naval advisory board is selfish and impracticable.

Mr. RANDALL. The chief officer of the Ordnance Bureau did not receive the approval and direction of the naval advisory board or he would have gone on with the work. That is the only reason I can conceive of.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. RANDALL. In a moment. I am not unfriendly to the investigation and testing of the practicability of those deflective turrets, but the law provides that that investigation and test shall be made by the naval advisory board. Until they act, of course nothing could be done.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It is my opinion the naval advisory board has done all it could to prevent the execution of that provision of the law.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can say that on his own responsibility.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And I do say it on my own responsibility.

Mr. RANDALL. For I know nothing about that matter.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on his own individual action——

Mr. RANDALL. No, not individual action.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, we will act on your judgment, for you certainly would not let it come in unless it were right. It is right to protect as far as possible the men on shipboard.

Mr. RANDALL. This is an amendatory clause, and that is the trouble about it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let it come in.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from New York says it does not relate to the original object as provided in the law last year. If that is discretionary, why not make this discretionary?

Mr. TALBOTT. The naval advisory board have the right under the law to adopt this method or to reject it.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman says this amendment does not relate to the $20,000 originally authorized in the law of March 3, 1883.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York is correct in saying that this is an entirely different proposition from the one of the last session of Congress. The appropriation of $20,000 made by the last Congress was for the purpose of investigating and testing the practicability of deflective turrets, while this is a proposition to put pivot-guns on the steel cruiser Chicago and mount them on N. B. Clark's single-gun deflective turrets or V shields.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. No, it is not.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman to wait until I have made my statement. As I understand his amendment he proposes to add the words that "the four pivot-guns of the Chicago to be mounted on Clark's single-deflective turret or V shield." It is a proposition to take part of the weight of the guns and to put it into the shield. No more weight is to be on the ship, but a portion of the weight of the guns is to be put into V shields.

The board to which the gentleman having charge of this bill alluded is in the Navy Department, and is opposed to carrying out the intention of the last Congress, which appropriated $20,000 for investigating and testing the practicability of deflective turrets designed by Passed Assistant Engineer Clark, a gentleman who because of a railroad accident now lies upon his back and can not move except with the aid of another. He is one of the most brilliant men in the country, and was recommended for naval service by the distinguised war governor of Pennsylvania, whose absence I am sorry to note on this occasion, for if he were here he would substantiate everything I have said. I refer to Governor CURTIN. He has taken the liveliest interest in Mr. Clark and his invention, because Mr. Clark was a protégé of his during the war.

Now, this distinguished passed-assistant engineer, N. B. Clark, of the Navy, has made an invention which it is believed will revolutionize the naval warfare of the world. He proposes by deflective armor to give eight times the resistance to be secured by upright armor.

On March 1 I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], "If we are to build ships, on what plan shall we build them; the present plan?" A correct answer to that will go to the root of this whole question. If we are going to have upright armor, and Passed-Assistant Engineer Clark is correct that upright armor has not one-eighth the power to resist projectiles that the deflective armor has—in order to test that matter the last Congress made an appropriation of $20,000, and this selfish advisory board or ordnance members of the board in the Navy Department has done so far everything it could to defeat the execution of the law which we passed at the last session, and the statement of the Committee on Appropriations as far as it goes substantiates that fact.

Although the appropriation for this experimental work was to be made immediately available and the bill passed in March, yet nothing was done looking to carrying out that provision until October. In addition to that, the whole sum appropriated was, as I am informed, put into a single target, requiring plans which could not be procured in this country, and that has not yet been put up for actual experiment.

Now this is a different proposition. This is a proposition to beat the advisory board, and I hope the House will do it, and that is to put on one of these new steel cruisers, the Chicago, which is I believe constructed on the deflective-armor principle—to put on that ship guns mounted on Clark's single-gun deflective turrets, and try the experiment fully and fairly, as it should be tried.

That is all I ask. It is a matter of simple right and propriety.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUTCHINS. I shall suggest, Mr. Chairman, the incorporation of an amendment to the amendment. I propose that we insert at the end of the pending amendment the words: "provided it shall not interfere with contracts already entered into by the Government for the construction of said vessel."

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. It will not be necessary to do that.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I do not know what effect the proposition may have in its present shape. We cannot afford to have these contracts open.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. The amendment in its present shape will not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York submit his amendment in writing?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I now send it to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the pending amendment the words:
"Provided, That it shall not change the contract entered into by the Government for the construction of said vessel."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let that be again reported. It was not heard distinctly.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. While I do not believe that we could interfere with the contracts, at any rate I am willing to accept the amendment if it is deemed necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is on agreeing to the amendment as modified by the gentleman who presented it.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completion of steam-machinery and boilers, with necessary fittings for sea-service, of steel cruisers and dispatch-boat, under contract with John Roach, as per act approved March 3, 1883: United States steel cruiser Chicago, $220,000; United States steel cruiser Boston, $155,000; United States steel cruiser Atlanta, $155,000; United States dispatch-boat Dolphin, $90,000; in all, $620,000.

For completing equipment outfits of three new cruisers and one dispatch-boat, now in course of construction, $78,600.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, after the line 323, insert:
"To complete the ordnance needed for the said vessels, $449,529."

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, in addressing the House the other day upon this bill I ventured to state that I had taken such pains as I could with the view of forming an opinion as to whether the criticisms which had been made upon the usefulness of the three cruisers we are now constructing are well founded or otherwise, and that I had come to the conclusion, from a somewhat careful examination of the subject, that those criticisms were not well founded. I would like to state now a little more in detail the conclusions at which I have arrived.

In judging, Mr. Chairman, of the merits of vessels of this class we should keep in view the fact that they should be compared only with vessels of the same class in foreign navies, and should be judged solely with reference to the uses for which they are designed. Judging these cruisers, then, by this standard, I do not hesitate to say that when completed they will be quite superior to any vessels of the same class in any of the navies of the world. The class of vessels in the English Navy to be compared with the Chicago is what is known there as the Amphion class, taking the name from the first vessel of that class which was built there. England has some twenty three or four vessels afloat or on the stocks of that class. And I say to the House that the Chicago, when completed, will be faster, stronger, and far more powerful in armament than any British vessel of that class.

The Boston and Atlanta are to be compared with what is known as the Iris and Mercury class, and of those vessels I may speak in similar terms. The Boston and Atlanta are larger, and, for offensive purposes, better provided than the English ship Iris and others of that class.

We should not compare vessels of this class with armored vessels. We do not find fault with our cavalry because the cavalry can not be used against fortifications. Ironclads are the fortifications of naval warfare; and, notwithstanding the many millions that have been spent upon them, even the countries which maintain the largest navies have in fact but few of them.

England has sixty-one ironclads all told; as to which her own authorities say that about fifty are fit for service. But of those fifty there are but a few of the formidable character which my colleague from New York seems continually to have in mind when he talks about the naval power of England.

I make the statement on this floor that even the much-derided Puritan, for the completion of which the committee has refused an appropriation, is by the confession of all competent critics a match for any vessel in the English Navy, with the exception of four. England has four ships which would undoubtedly overmatch the Puritan. The Puritan is a vessel designed to have 12 inches of steel armor upon her sides and 27 inches of protection upon her turrets; 12 inches being steel, 12½ inches being oak backing, and 2½ inches being an interior skin to the turret.

There are two things necessary for a useful vessel of war: First, that she should be a good ship; and next, that she should have guns. And I have to urge upon this House the passage of this amendment, which I understand to be necessary in order to accomplish the arming of these vessels. The Chicago will not have great defensive capacity. She is to be an unarmored ship. But she will have, if armed in the manner designed by the advisory board, very great offensive capacity. And if she should be in action even with an ironclad, and be fought with that resolution which has been characteristic of our Navy in the past, she would be a most uncomfortable antagonist for any ship in the world. She is so built as to be very difficult indeed to sink. There are ten main compartments and seventy-five subordinate compartments in her hold; in all, eighty-five water-tight compartments; and with her great offensive power—I mean with the enormous weight of metal which is in her broadsides——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. DORSHEIMER.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I say, considering the enormous weight of metal in the broadsides of the Chicago, and the difficulty there would be in sinking her, and considering how short naval contests are—even in the old time a great naval battle was fought in fifteen minutes, the Constitution reducing the Guerriere in fifteen minutes from the time the first shot was fired; and considering that in modern naval battles complete results have been obtained in less time than that—in view of these considerations, the Chicago, fought with the resolution characteristic of our naval officers, would be in a desperate emergency a most formidable antagonist to any ship.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in not sending an unarmed ship to the seas. In the colloquy between the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] the other day I was surprised to hear that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] placed some reliance upon the old guns of our Navy. There is nothing more certain than the fact that the most inefficient part of our Navy is its guns. The vessels are bad enough. Admiral Rodgers said in his testimony before the Senate committee, with reference to the last vessel he commanded, that she was "the most comfortable ship he ever put his foot into, and that he could make her go seven knots an hour if the wind did not blow against her, but if the wind blew against her she would not go at all." But inefficient as the Pensacola, the vessel to which he referred, was as a ship, she was still more inefficient as an instrument of war. I mean that her guns were the weakest part of her. And I trust we shall produce no "mute, inglorious" frigates to go to sea if we are to build any vessels at all.

I entered upon the examination of this subject with a considerable amount of prejudice produced by powerful articles in a foreign magazine against these vessels, and I have come to the conclusion that they are wisely planned and will make most efficient instruments of war for vessels of their class. And I wish that this House shall give them an armament. The contracts for a portion at least of these armaments have been made and are now in progress; and the effect of refusing an appropriation will be to stop work on these contracts.

A gun can be no more constructed in a day than a vessel can be. The construction of guns goes along pari passu with the construction of ships. If we wish to have our ships fit for the uses for which they are designed let us prepare the armament for them.

I have but a word more to address to the House. I have found no subject of legislation whatever which has engaged the attention of Congress which seems to me so to interest a most anxious people as the question of the reconstruction of the Navy. There is not a house in my district which is not within the fire of a hostile fleet lying in the open sea off Coney Island, where no gun of a fortification yet designed could by any possibility reach them. And I believe that the people of the United States would be glad to see a spirit of encouragement to the Navy animating this House and the co-ordinate branch of Congress.

I am prepared here, acting upon my own responsibility, to vote for the armament of these vessels, and I will also say that I am prepared to vote for the construction of the additional cruisers provided for by the bill lately passed by the Senate and which is now on the Speaker's table. I hope this House will come up to its duty and no longer permit the country to remain in a state of helplessness, which may be satisfactory to those who prefer a Chinese policy, but is not at all satisfactory to a brave and martial people like our own. [Great applause.]

Mr. BELFORD. On yesterday my delightful and lovable friend from the State of New York [Mr. COX] appeared in the rôle of an advertising agent for Mrs. Langtry [laughter], and after furnishing the prospectus to the House, for some reason which passes my comprehension he omitted it from the RECORD. If I had not known that that advertisement had been written by the great humorist of the country, Eugene Field, I would have concluded that it had been written by my brilliant friend from New York.

I may have expressed some admiration at the theatrical exhibition here on behalf of Mrs. Langtry; but I never knew that that had anything especially to do with navy affairs until I read the wonderful book published by my loving friend entitled From Broadway to the Bosphorus. He went to London. When he reached there, if my memory does not fail me, he was captivated by the glamour of the "Lily of the Jerseys." She was floating on the sea of imperial favor, and the heart and soul of my friend, withered as it had been by twenty-seven years of public service in this House, were absolutely captivated, and while in London he could think of nothing except the beautiful Langtry. [Laughter.]

He left there and went to the Grand Theater of Paris, and contrasts Langtry with the thin, elongated Bernhardt. He said: "Oh, could I but inspect the flashing eyes, the pearly teeth, the auburn hair of Langtry, I would be content and happy." [Laughter.]

When he reached Egypt he stood in front of the Sphynx and asked that mysterious figure why he was unable to see Langtry. He stood in front of the pyramids of Egypt, with a picture in his left hand representing Napoleon making his campaign on a camel, and said: "O Lord! if Langtry was here to make this desert blossom like the rose!" [Great laughter.] So much for Langtry. [Renewed laughter.]

I desire everybody to read the beautiful book which my friend has written, because I feel a profound admiration for his ability. I have no hesitation in declaring in his presence and in the presence of this nation that the speech which my friend made on the census is equal to the speech that Demosthenes made on the crown. [Laughter.] Now, that is not taffy at all. [Great laughter.]

Therefore, as he was advertising Langtry yesterday, I will try to advertise his book to-day, which ought to be read by every man, woman, and child of this Republic.

Mr. REED. Especially child.

Mr. BELFORD. I come now to the measures of the pending bill. [Laughter.] I confess—— [Here the hammer fell.] Oh, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KASSON. In order that we may hear his views on this bill I will yield my time to the gentleman from Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yields five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. I confess that I know but little about naval affairs, because I live in a dry and arid region. I hardly know which end of a ship should go foremost. [Laughter.] I am not skilled in such matters like my friend from Kansas and my friend from Indiana.

But there are some things I do know, and one is that my friend from New York [Mr. COX] is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, and that he has been for a great many years a Representative from the city of New York. And I know further that according to the statement made by his colleague, Governor DORSHEIMER, England with her ironclads can anchor three miles away from that great commercial and monetary metropolis of this nation and blow it to pieces. Yet the gentleman is practically consenting to a reduction of eight millions of dollars below the estimate made by the Secretary of the Navy.

I propose to devote some time during this session of Congress to pounding it into your heads why you are doing it. You are doing it for the purpose of keeping $150,000,000 of surplus revenue idle in the Treasury, and you can not deny it. Why are you keeping it there? Because the people of New York own $305,000,000 of bonds that are open to be called in to-day, and it is your interest to see that they are not paid, but that the people of this country shall be taxed 3 per cent. per annum on that debt, although you are able to satisfy $150,000,000 of that debt to-morrow. Oh, sham and hypocrisy, thy name is Democracy! [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will first call attention of the committee to the substantial part of the speech made by my honorable friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], if there is any substance in it. He says that I voted against these steel cruisers, and thereby failed to protect the city of New York, which is at the mercy of the English and other men-of-war. Now every one who knows any thing about the Navy—and of course I do not refer to the gentleman from Colorado, for he has confessed his absolute ignorance—he can not tell which end of a vessel runs foremost or whether he is running at one end or both ends at the same time—[laughter]—every one who knows any thing about the Navy knows that four years ago I proposed in this House an opportunity for the construction of cannon equal to the great Krupp guns, for the very purpose of meeting the emergency now suggested so weakly in the building of these little cruisers, which are intended to chase unarmed merchantmen. This is answer enough to the substantial part of the gentleman's speech.

Now, as to the little nonsense which the gentleman has worked in on me, there is a general supposition around where I sit that there is some collusion between the gentleman and myself for the purpose of advertising either the dramatic stars or some literature or other. [Laughter.] I plead not guilty. I love to hear the gentleman from Colorado speak; even when he is irrelevant he is interesting; and he was never more irrelevant than when he broke into this naval debate the other day with his allusion to the wool question. The only possible connection I can see between the wool question and the Navy grows out of Jason's Argonautic expedition after wool. [Laughter.] There may be a good connection there; but it did not occur to the gentleman. He made the point that this side of the House would not vote on the proposition of the gentleman now acting as chairman of this Committee of the Whole [Mr. CONVERSE] to raise the duty on wool. He intimated that our part of the House ran away and acted as cowards, and he has been intimating ever since that the Democracy are not up to his high ideal of statesmanship, which seems to be to make a great sluiceway from the Treasury that fraud may come in, that spoliations may ensue, that great gun factories or establishments for the construction of steel cruisers may get our surplus money at pleasure.

I am not in favor of carrying on a naval establishment only one-half of which is at sea—though sometimes the whole thing is "at sea," I think. [Laughter.] Our Navy seems to be a sort of amphibious arrangement, one-half of the officers on land, a portion at sea, and some between the two, "waiting orders." Yet we are asked to keep up the roll of such a Navy and build vessels for it, vessels which can not protect our ports or our harbors.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] has made for the first time since this debate began a serious speech in some respects. I wish that he had been more serious, and had given us some of that good old native sense which belongs to him, instead of this everlasting tirade of nonsense against the party to which I have the honor to belong.

We are not in favor of the ideas of prodigality prevailing among gentlemen on the other side. We are opposing now the very measure which was applauded on that side of the House, because when next January and February come these cruisers will not then be completed, and the armament can then be ordered by Congress, if necessary. Of that my colleague from New York will speak more at length. But I say to gentlemen on this side that since our committee has perfected this bill by razing down these estimates and prodigalities $8,000,000 we can do no better than stand by the committee, stand by economy, stand by the platforms of every party, even the prodigal party represented on the other side of the House; and in the end the people, thank God, will stand by us, because they are honest. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is on the part of the Democratic majority of this House a disposition hostile to the efficiency of the American Navy, either in its line and staff or in the construction of vessels to put it into an effective condition. It is a well-known fact that at the conclusion of the late war the Navy of this country—having been originated for the emergency forced upon it of blockading the Southern coast lines, having been improvised for the occasion and some of it built out of green timber—when peace suddenly came upon the country was no longer fit for service. That fact was certified to the administration and the Congress of the United States by your own Secretary of the Navy. Yet for ten years, during which the Republican party controlled every department of the Government, that party refused to send these unserviceable vessels to the junk-shop or the auctioneer's block, but kept them in the navy-yards for the sake of a prodigal and corrupt use of the public money—not for naval warfare, but for partisan political warfare.

A new use was found for navy-yards; not to equip and build men-of-war to defend the national honor from insult, but to employ voters to maintain the Republican party in power. Hence year after year money was poured out over the hulks, and rotten wood was covered with armor until the expenditures absorbed the appropriations, and the Government paid three prices for vessels that under no circumstances could be of benefit or use either in peace or in war. This was in direct contrast with the policy that England has pursued. Upon the introduction of compound engines into naval construction her entire fleet, or a large part of it, went to the junk-shop or under the auctioneer's hammer, and she supplied her navy with vessels propelled by improved engines and armaments, thus profiting by experience, and being unwilling to expend money in useless attempts to remodel her ironclads, much less to plate rotten hulls with armor, as the Republican Congress did.

This proposition, then, is certainly true, that if the American Navy is in a condition of imbecility the responsibility belongs to the other side of this House. I claim for the Democracy that we are not in favor of continuing that state of affairs; but we are willing to do anything that an economical and wise administration may render advisable in order to put the Navy upon the highest stage of efficiency that is possible.

Mr. Chairman, what is the lesson to be derived from the experience of other nations in building ironclads? They have sacrificed everything—speed, seaworthiness—for the sake of having an impregnable floating battery. Gentlemen need not be alarmed for the safety of New York or San Francisco, because these ironclads are unseaworthy; and if all the nations of the earth should declare war against us to-morrow probably not more than one-third of their ironclads would ever come within range of any point on the Atlantic or Pacific coast. They would founder in mid-voyage or miscarry as to time and place of rendezvous. And if they did not, shore batteries, earthworks, mounted with improved guns of the highest penetrating power, would command the anchorage at which they rode. Since the time when at Fort Moultrie a log pen proved equal to ships of the line, to the day when Sumter in ruins showed a sand-bag fort more formidable than her stone casemates had been, no port need despair of defense, much less surrender unconditionally in advance. Besides, the art of torpedo warfare has shown the fact that they are effective as a defense against any armor-clad that floats.

Not only so, but under the bill and under the policy which seems to animate Congress to inaugurate a system of building swift cruisers, made after the very best models of modern naval architecture, we would have swift cruisers that could sail around them and blow them up with guns of improved power or torpedoes. That is a lesson we ought to learn from the failures of other nations. I do not believe that it is wise for this Government to go into building tremendous ironclads for the purpose of floating them within the headlands of coast lines. I believe our present policy is to set upon the sea the very best cruisers and to arm them according to the very highest state of the art. The only doubt I have of the amendment of my friend from New York arises from the fact that, as I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York the other day, there was under the command and within the control of the Government of the United States money to put armament on these vessels under this bill and previous laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will take the floor and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. CALDWELL. I thank my colleague; and I have only a few more words to say.

I say, Mr. Chairman, so far from endeavoring or desiring to cripple the efficiency of the Navy, I will vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New York if there is not the power within the control of the Government now to make the armament of those steel cruisers up to the very highest state of naval art.

It is said perhaps you will have to put some of the old and comparatively worthless guns in these new steel cruisers. If it comes to that I will say, Mr. Chairman, that out of abundant caution I am inclined to support the proposition of the gentleman from New York. If the United States Navy is in the condition of imbecility that gentlemen on the other side of the House have said, then it is our bounden duty that we shall do the best thing the experience of other nations teaches us to do, to render it efficient.

Indeed, sir, I did not know until it was said by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] the other day that the Republican administration of affairs in this country had reduced our national honor so low. I knew that this country had been spit upon when by resolution of this House we asked for a respite for an Irish-American citizen who was rushed to death with indecent haste by England. I did know that resolutions of condolence and sympathy on the death of a foreign statesman passed by this House had been returned in contempt by the German chancellor; but I did not know until that gentleman stated it that this nation had been, by Republican administration, reduced so low that our treaty obligations had been disregarded and our officials abroad insulted. I did not know that this nation, under Republican rule, occupied such a miserable position of national and international pusillanimity. Such a thing was not known under Democratic sway.

It was a great argument to my mind, Mr. Chairman, that we should speedily build a navy such as in the light of modern science and the perfection of naval architecture should be equal, class for class, with that of any other nation. That is my proposition to-day; and unless I am satisfied there are funds available to put proper armaments in these new cruisers I will vote for the amendment submitted by my honorable friend from New York.

To render them of use they should be armed with guns capable of penetrating the armor of the best ironclads, and fitted up to sweep like eagles around the mailed sea-turtles and monitors and destroy them by their celerity of motion, making effective their improved ordnance and torpedoes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] with a great deal of interest and with intense approval. It looked to me as if there was a possibility of there being statesmanlike action on the part of the Democratic party at some future time, but I am sorry to be obliged to say to the gentleman from New York he will find the statesmanship expressed by him on his side just as useless as if it had been expressed on ours; for the applause which followed the remarks of the other gentleman from New York shows that the Democratic party purpose to reject wise counsel even when it comes from their own side. They can always be depended on to suppress any manifestation of statesmanship even by their own men.

Now, sir, never was a proposition so simple and plain as that which he indorses. We are building ships, and yet those ships are to go forth without any armament. They are to be practically useless simply because a Democratic Congress proposes to refuse to build guns, and nobody knows better than the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that when these ships are finished it will be impossible to put armament upon them, because there is no armament provided. And they refuse to appropriate any money to build guns. They know it will take at least eighteen months to build a big gun, and yet they sit here idly in their places refusing to make the necessary appropriations, and all upon the score of economy.

Now, what economy is there in sending ships to sea with no offensive power? What economy is there, when we have money in the Treasury collected for this very purpose, to refuse to expend it, and to sit idly in our places declining to perform a plain and simple duty?

This committee report in favor of finishing these ships, and upon what ground do they refuse to arm them? Upon what ground do they purpose to waste the public money by building ships and taking away from them all their offensive power? It looks to me as if they had deliberately determined to waste the money which they purpose themselves to expend in building ships.

What good, Mr. Chairman, are ships without any offensive power? What is the use of a cruiser without cannon? And yet that is precisely the attitude in which this committee presents itself, by recommending large expenditures for the completion of ships and absolutely refusing to expend a dollar to arm them with suitable cannon.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Chairman, the charge has been hurled against this side of the House almost ad nauseam that we occupy an attitude suggested by their fertile imaginations which is inimical to the construction of a navy that shall be commensurate in strength and armament with the greatness and dignity of this country. Now, sir, the charge is an unjust one. It is unjust certainly so far as concerns the Representatives on this floor who come from the section of country that I do. Our highest aspiration is to equip and construct a competent American navy.

But I desire to call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side to the fact that the history of this country for the last ten or fifteen years affords some very substantial reasons why the Democracy on this floor should go somewhat slowly, should exercise a sound conservation in consenting to place themselves in the position of making extravagant or lavish appropriations for the purposes contemplated by this bill. I do not intend to stand here, Mr. Chairman, and reproduce to this country a sketch of the administration of the Naval Department when Robeson was its Secretary, which administration was so redolent of spoliation and theft that it made his administration of that Department a stench in the nostrils of all decency. But when the charge is made of hostility on the part of this side of the House against the construction of a suitable navy for this Government I deem it an appropriate occasion to call the attention of the country and the House to the fact that a gentleman has been selected as the Secretary of the Navy, and who now holds that position, whose history is what?

Why, sir, it is a well known fact that his name had been previously sent in to the United States Senate for confirmation to a subordinate position in the Treasury Department and the nomination by a Republican Senate was rejected. Why? I ask gentlemen on the other side why?

You can state the reason if you wish. But after that, after his repudiation by his own party, this Republican administration sent his name in and it was confirmed for a still more exalted and still more elevated position, to wit, a Cabinet position. In my own judgment, sir, the last Congressional election affords something of a clue to this mystery, and I want to call the country's attention to a single fact in connection with it. At the Mare Island navy-yard, which is in my district in California, there were cast in the last election, at which I was a candidate for Congress, 603 votes. How many of this number do you suppose voted against the Democratic ticket and against myself?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana (from his seat). All of them, I suppose.

Mr. HENLEY. All of them! You are right. The gentleman knows that was a most probable result. He may well admit the fact, because he knows it is not susceptible of truthful denial. How was that done? Mr. Chairman, it was managed in a way that will reflect shame and ignominy on every participant therein until it and they sink into oblivion. They had a table near the polls in the town in which Mare Island is situated and the Republican party had arranged it, and I believe under the inspiration if not with the express approbation of this present Secretary of the Navy. This table, I say, was near the voting-place in the town, and that table was the only place where the people could get the Republican tickets. They knew whoever did not come to that table for the purpose of getting a ticket was not voting the Republican ticket. At this table were the bosses of the Mare Island navy-yard, and whenever a man presented himself to get a ticket his name was checked off from a list kept there of the operatives at that yard.

In addition to that, however, the law of California prescribes that within a hundred feet of the polling-place the ballot must be folded up and not opened within that distance; so these men who came over from Mare Island were instructed to go to this table and get the Republican ticket, for it could not be procured anywhere else, and were then instructed to hold up their hands and walk along in that way from the point where they got the ticket until they reached the ballot-box and deposited it! Why was that? It was simply to overawe and intimidate and coerce free American citizens into voting against their political convictions.

Mr. REED. Were they murdered for not voting right?

Mr. HENLEY. Were they murdered?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENLEY. No, sir; but the men who inspired that sort of thing would not have suffered much wrong in the estimation of decent people if they had been. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GLASCOCK. Will my colleague allow me to say—they were not murdered, but they were discharged. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that whoever would make men vote in that way, whoever would be guilty of such infamy as that, is capable in my judgment of the commission of a crime equal in turpitude to that of murder.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENLEY. I should like to have a little more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. MCCORMICK. In some of the arguments offered during the discussion of the provisions of this bill we might infer that war and invasion are but dangers of bygone ages, and that the reign of universal peace had come. While I love peace and deplore the necessities of war, the signs of the times are not such as to warrant the conclusion that the millennium has come.

We read in the good book of a time when the people shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks, and that nation shall not lift up the sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more; but that declaration, while it is a truth, will not justly apply to the condition of the nations of the present day. However desirable that happy condition of the harmony of nations might be, it yet remains that human nature and human passion and depravity are ever the same, and their legitimate consequences inevitably follow as the result of their existence.

Universal peace will come from virtues that spring up and flourish on a higher plane than that of political policies and parties, and we in the discussion of the vital questions that pertain to national peace and safety and honor must take things as they exist. Let it be remembered that we have not taken our place among the great nations of the globe without the courage of our convictions, that we were capable of taking care of ourselves, and by demonstrating that fact on land and sea; and the very fact that our flag is everywhere respected by the nations of the world to-day arises from the other fact that we placed ourselves in the position to take care of ourselves, and it was not by a sickly sentimentalism or a tame submission to the dictates of foreign nations. No. Our chief distinction comes to us from the fact that while it was even at a great sacrifice of blood and treasure, we made the best of the means at hand, that we used the power we possessed and used it bravely and well to maintain our rights and courageously establish our claim to nationality in the face of the whole world. Our Navy, slender as it was, bore no unimportant part in that great work. There is an independence and grandeur in power, not in pomp and display, that produces respect which never comes to those who are not able to stand in self-defense. The true spirit of the nation is like the spirit of the true man, to do the right and be prepared by a proper use of its facilities and opportunities at the same time to maintain and defend it.

It has been well said by a good authority in political economy that a reduction of armaments does but increase the danger of war by emboldening those who, with envy and jealousy natural to mankind, are watching for an opportunity to humble us.

War is one of a trio of great calamities, but as a last resort it frequently comes as the cure of evils that other remedies have failed to reach, and as we are not exempt from the common law, and as the condition of virtue and morals is not yet so efficient in the earth in their beneficent results as to secure the reign of universal peace, it is well that we use the power we possess to properly care for and protect our own great national interests.

England well understands the sources of her power, and holds her scattered empire under firm control by her vast maritime power.

Three other such privateers like the Alabama to accompany her on her ocean voyages for the destruction of our commerce during the late civil war would have done more for the recognition of the Southern confederacy by foreign powers than any five such battles as that of Manassas Junction or that of the Wilderness, with vastly less destruction of human life.

As a matter of prudence and safety, we owe it to ourselves to provide for and properly equip our Navy with well-disciplined officers, war ships, and proper armament, and thus be prepared for such threatening contingencies as may at any time arise. A proper expenditure here may in the end prove wise economy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. As the political aspect of the question has been satisfactorily settled, I would like to be heard for a moment on the merits of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

The Secretary of the Navy recommended in his report that the sum of $683,000 should be appropriated for the armament of the steel cruisers. Two hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars, the proportion allotted from the $1,300,000 voted last session for the construction of the cruisers, being deducted from it left the sum of $449,000 as the sum which he wished to be appropriated to complete the armament of the vessels. The committee have not recommended that appropriation, and therefore the gentleman from New York assumes that the Department is without any funds to furnish this ordnance.

In the first place, the committee has not been advised of what contracts have been made thus far for expending the $234,000 with a detailed statement of that amount, and they could not vote intelligently a further appropriation.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I must decline to yield, as I have but five minutes. I will, however, hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Did you call for information and have it refused?

Mr. HUTCHINS. We have no information in relation to the expenditure in detail.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] says we should not have ships without an armament. That would seem to be a self-evident proposition, and one that needs no stating here. We all concede it. But in the first place we must recollect these ships are not to be completed until after Congress shall have been in session, when it again convenes, for more than fifty days, and in the mean time, notwithstanding the encomium which he has passed upon these vessels, saying he has no doubt that they will prove efficient and serviceable, I have great doubt about it. The Chief Constructor of the Navy, however, has no doubt on the subject. I appeal to the officer in charge of the Bureau of Construction and invoke his testimony against that of my friend from New York.

Mr. TALBOTT. The trouble is, he is not in charge. If he were in charge he very likely would not say so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] declines to yield.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Chairman, I was in hopes I should not be compelled to place this testimony before the House. I do not desire to antagonize one Department or one bureau of a Department against another. But it is a duty I owe when we come to discuss this matter to state to the House what the testimony on this subject is. The Chief Constructor, Mr. Wilson, in his examination before the Senate committee, says——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RANDALL was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. HUTCHINS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In his examination, in speaking of the Boston and Atlanta—and I hope the committee will listen to this language—Chief Constructor Wilson says:

> I prepared the lines of that ship and had the principal plans blocked out when I found the naval advisory board had changed their mind; instead of having a ship with a top-gallant forecastle on her, as I had agreed on and they had recommended, they changed the vessels by cutting them down forward and aft and building a central superstructure, with the rig changed to that of a brig. That was sent to me for an opinion—that is, whether I agreed to it or not.
> I indorsed and returned it to the Secretary, stating, in substance, that in my own opinion the alterations made necessary in the adoption of the present arrangement of the battery by the naval advisory board from the general arrangement of the vessel as first proposed by them and indorsed by this bureau can not now be recommended or indorsed by it, as it believes that very many essential and necessary features and qualities that an efficient naval vessel of this class should have will be sacrificed by it. The board took their own views of the matter, submitted them to the Secretary, and I received an order from Secretary Chandler to proceed with the design of the 3,000-ton cruiser, conforming the arrangement of the battery and the rig to the recommendation of the naval advisory board, which I did.

So that we have here an order from the Secretary of the Navy directing how these vessels shall be constructed.

In my judgment we had better pause, and not make large appropriations until it is settled that these vessels are a success. I was surprised when my friend from New York declared he was willing to vote for seven more of these cruisers.

If he had read the testimony taken in this matter before the Senate committee I do not think he would be prepared to say that he would overrule the naval constructor and say to him that he knew more about the construction of vessels than the constructor. Before he makes such a declaration as that he should read the testimony and consider it well. I may be convinced that it is wise to do it; I am not yet.

One word more. As the Committee on Appropriations think, and as I think, there is at this time of appropriations heretofore made the sum of $550,000 which can be employed in the construction of this ordnance. There was appropriated in 1883 for breech-loading rifle-cannon $100,000, about $50,000 of which is still unexpended. There was allotted from the appropriations for the increase of the Navy for 1884 the sum of $234,000, and the current appropriation for the year 1884 was $150,000 for increasing the ordnance. In this bill we appropriate $100,000 for the same purpose, making in the aggregate $584,000 for building these guns, less the amount expended for rifle-cannon.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. TALBOTT took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution of the Senate No. 64, providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate; had requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. BUTLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 221) to amend sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park;

A bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1393) to reimburse Frailey & De Verne for money paid into the Treasury of the United States;

A bill (S. 1508) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for the use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes; and

A bill (S. 1509) to regulate the powers and duties of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CALKINS. It ought not to be forgotten in this discussion at this point that when the recent war closed in this country naval architecture had been revolutionized, and the Navy of the United States was then the foremost navy of the world. From 1867 to 1874 the Navy Department proceeded to construct naval vessels in accordance with those that were adopted and found useful during the late war.

When the Democratic party at that time came into power the construction and completion of these vessels were stopped, whether wisely or unwisely I am not going to say. Other nations proceeded with their experiments, and the results of them have been published to the world. I am not here to charge that one side of this House is opposed to navies and the other side in favor of navies. I believe that what is a good government for me is a good government for you, and what is a bad government for me is a bad one for you. I am here, however, to say that if you believe we ought to have a navy, if you believe that the Government should be assisted in the right direction in building up a navy, now is the time for you to show that belief by making the necessary appropriations to do it.

That leads me to the next proposition. I stated in the general debate upon this bill that England had spent $500,000,000 on her navy since our war closed. I hold in my hand a book written by Lieutenant Perry, of our Navy, in which he gives the English budgets for the navy department from 1875 to 1879, inclusive. From that I find that I rather understated than overstated the expenditures of England on her navy. It will be seen upon examination of that book that since the monitors first became known to the navies of the world England has spent over $50,000,000 annually on her navy. In 1867 England appropriated in one appropriation $40,000,000 for arming and strengthening her coast defenses, not included in this budget.

I pass now to the next proposition to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and it is in answer to the statement of the chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations [Mr. HUTCHINS]. He stated that the Committee on Appropriations were not in possession of any facts with reference to the expenditure of the money which was allotted last year for the making of guns. On the 13th of February I incorporated into my speech an itemized statement of the expenditures of the money allotted for the building of guns, to which I now call his attention and the attention of this committee.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is that statement furnished to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CALKINS. The committee could have had it by calling for it at any time. I called for it, and got it from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I said I was not aware that the committee was in possession of any detailed statement.

Mr. CALKINS. I did not say that the Committee on Appropriations had this statement; but I say if they did not have it it was because they did not ask for it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Has the committee that information?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; since the 13th of February.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Has it been furnished to the committee by the Department?

Mr. CALKINS. No; because they did not ask for it.

Mr. REED. Why did you not ask for it?

Mr. RANDALL. It was represented to us that a contract had been made under that allotment. I do not know that the money has all been expended, but it is contracted for.

Mr. CALKINS. The statement furnished to me and which I put in my speech showed that $233,034 had been expended under contract for making these guns, leaving only $966.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Expended or contracted to be expended.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir; expended or in process of being expended. The money will all run out by the 1st of next July.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. Then there is another detailed statement showing just what it will take to arm these steel cruisers. This I also brought to the attention of the committee on the 13th of February. Any gentleman can look at the statement and see precisely what it is.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That the committee has.

Mr. CALKINS. The amount is $447,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Four hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. CALKINS. We commenced building a 6-inch gun twenty-six feet long a year ago. There was a trial of it only the other day. If you are to build guns sufficient to arm these vessels, every man who has looked into the question knows that it will take from fourteen to twenty-four months to complete them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LONG obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

Mr. CALKINS. It will take from fourteen to twenty-four months to complete these guns; yet you propose, after the 1st of next July, to stop everything until Congress shall meet again; and that meeting will be at a short session, which as we all know is almost entirely occupied in the passing of appropriation bills and a few other necessary matters. You propose to stop the manufacture of these guns, and after having appropriated the money for building these ships, to leave them with no armament except the old smooth-bore guns.

It has been said that there are several hundred thousand dollars—altogether about $500,000—which can be used for this purpose. Why, sir, gentlemen know that we are now taking our old cannon and making rifles of them; and this money is being expended in that way.

But that is not the kind of armament we desire for these steel cruisers. Let me call attention to the sort of guns now being made by the other naval powers of the world. I read from an article in the last number of the North American Review, written by General H. A. Smalley:

> An Armstrong breech-loading rifled 100-ton gun, caliber 17¾ inches, and 33 feet length of bore, was fired with a charge of 776 pounds of powder, giving the projectile, which weighed 2,000 pounds, an initial velocity of 1,832 feet a second and an initial energy of 46,580 foot-tons.

This is the sort of guns used recently by British vessels when they succeeded in demolishing the city of Alexandria at a distance of eight miles.

What is the answer gentlemen give us? They say we can perfect our coast defenses by building and securing our fortifications. Why, sir, does not every gentleman know that the city of New York is a mark that vessels armed with guns of the sort I have described may not miss, while a vessel carrying one of these guns, six or eight miles out in the ocean, can not be reached by a gun on a coast defense? What, then, have we to do? We must build some sort of vessels by which we can go out to sea and meet the vessels of an enemy; and we must arm our vessels with steel guns. We want rifles that shall be a match for the guns carried by the vessels of other nations.

Now, the $447,000 called for by the Secretary of the Navy will put aboard these cruisers guns that will cope with the guns of other nations; probably not the heaviest; but the gun recently constructed by Lieutenant Curtis, a report as to which I have just seen in the press, has proved a great success. It is a 6-inch gun twenty-six feet long. It is said that the initial velocity of that gun exceeds that of the one to which I have just referred. It has been built under the provision of the last appropriation bill.

But we must proceed with this work; we must have these guns; and even if we do not use them upon these cruisers they will be ready for gunboats when Congress shall see fit to build up a navy.

One word further. My friend from New York has made an argument against these steel cruisers; he has read testimony in support of it. Now, if he believes sincerely that the statement of the Chief Constructor is true, why should we appropriate anything to finish these steel cruisers?

Mr. RANDALL. We are bound by the contract.

Mr. CALKINS. I know we are bound by contract; but if you believe sincerely that to spend money in this manner is throwing it away, why not try to compromise and save a little money?

Mr. RANDALL. We were debarred from entering upon a judgment as to these vessels because the contract was made, and if we did not give the money we might subject the Government to excessive damages.

Mr. CALKINS. Is that the ground upon which the gentleman puts the appropriation?

Mr. RANDALL. No; I state that fact.

Mr. CALKINS. Is that the ground upon which this appropriation is put?

Mr. RANDALL. Part of the ground.

Mr. CALKINS. Part of it. The fact is, and it may as well be stated—just a moment, Mr. Chairman, before you cut me off—that the two bureaus of the Navy Department, the Bureau of Steam-Engineering and the Bureau of Construction and Repair, have been at loggerheads for years. Every gentleman knows it; and when I offered to come in a year ago to have it corrected, for some unknown reason it was voted down. And yesterday, when I undertook to correct it, it was again voted down. Yet here we are building a vessel without reference to the Steam-Engineering Bureau, and building engines and machinery without reference to the Bureau of Construction and Repair, so that when we bring them together we have to tear them apart in order to put the machinery into the vessels. In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is a fight going on. One bureau wishes to build wooden vessels and the other wishes to get abreast of the times by building steel vessels. That is what the fight is about.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DARGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a strong navy. I am satisfied there are many gentlemen on this side of the House who are also in favor of an efficient navy. I do not agree with those gentlemen who maintain that the interests and dignity of this nation can be protected without force. This, sir, is the greatest commercial age in the history of the world. It is an age when nations more than at any other time are engaged in commerce and have intercommunication with one another, and such are the conditions of competition for the trade of the world that at any moment complications may arise leading to war and requiring the use of force. Enlightened and humane as the present age certainly is, the millennium has not yet arrived, and force may be necessary in order to protect the interests of the United States.

This, sir, is a great nation and eminently a commercial one, and ought to have a great navy. I for one, not recognizing party politics in this matter and declining to be controlled by party considerations, am prepared under proper circumstances to vote a liberal appropriation for the improvement of our navy. But as I understand this matter (and I now address myself to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and particularly to the last gentleman who addressed the House), the work now being carried on is an experiment. The condition of the matter is just this, so far as I have been able to learn it: Here are vessels being constructed about which there is uncertainty as to whether they will subserve the purpose for which they have been designed.

The question has been asked, "Then why go on with their construction?" The reason, sir, has already been given. We should go on in order to ascertain whether the experiment will succeed or not. There are those who think these vessels will prove a success, while there are others who believe they will not. Appropriations have already been made and money has already been expended in their construction. Is it not right, therefore, in this uncertainty of the result of the experiment, to wait until the matter has been determined before going further and making additional appropriations? We are asked to provide for build ing guns to go with these vessels, when it is still uncertain whether the vessels will prove seaworthy. We have arrived at a position where we can say we will not go any further until we are satisfied of the result of that experiment, and that we will postpone the making of the guns until the problem in reference to these steel-clad vessels has been satisfactorily solved. The sole question is, shall we complete an experiment already begun as economically as possible, or shall we add the cost of guns for which we may never have use?

For one, and I am satisfied I speak the sentiments of many on this side of the House, I am prepared when the suggestion comes from either side of this House to vote a liberal appropriation when a plan for increasing the efficiency of the Navy conceded to be feasible and practicable is presented. I am willing when such a plan is presented, and not before, to go as far as any gentleman of the other side in building up an effective and powerful navy, for I think the honor and dignity and safety of this nation demand we should have such a navy.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman from South Carolina takes his seat I would like to ask him whether the experiment of which he speaks can successfully be made by building these vessels without armament?

Mr. DARGAN. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, if it is necessary in order that the experiment may be fully tested that the armament shall also be provided, I am willing to vote for providing that armament at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, other matters are pressing, and as the House clearly comprehends the question now pending, I will move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto in fifteen minutes. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] desires five minutes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I should also like to have five minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. And so should I.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to make it twenty minutes, if that will be agreeable to gentlemen.

Mr. REED. What is it?

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to close debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto in twenty minutes.

Mr. REED. Say on the pending amendments, and I shall have no objection. If there are other amendments we may find ourselves in the position we did yesterday, voting on important propositions without any opportunity to explain.

Mr. RANDALL. If that be agreed to by unanimous consent in committee I will consent.

Mr. REED. I think it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and debate on the pending amendment is limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, there was a difference between the advisory board and the naval constructor. The naval constructor desired that the new steel cruisers should be built, as respects their hull, after the style of the heaviest of the old vessels of the Swatara class, that is to say, that they should have top-gallant forecastles and poop-decks. Now, a top-gallant forecastle and a poop-deck on the stern are houses built on the decks of the ship. The advisory board determined that it was advisable that these vessels should have great offensive power; that the guns should have a wide range or sweep and should have a great fore-and-aft fire. For that purpose, or rather to secure that end, the advisory board recommended that as to the Boston and Atlanta the houses should be taken off the deck, for there is no method of getting great fore-and-aft fire of a vessel if her deck is incumbered with such structures.

That, Mr. Chairman, was all the difference that existed, except as to the rate, between the naval constructor and the advisory board. But the advisory board was the supreme authority, and of course the Secretary of the Navy followed the suggestions of that board and carried them out by his orders, as he was bound to do.

Now I want to say a word on another subject. I do not accuse my colleague of disingenuousness, but will content myself by saying that he did what is done sometimes in courts of law, he omitted to read the most pregnant part of the testimony from which he quoted. What does the Chief Constructor say about this subject?

In the first place—

And he is now speaking of the two vessels—the Boston and the Atlanta—these ships have not sail power enough to go anywhere.

Well, of course their sail power is only auxiliary. They are designed to have full power of steam, with auxiliary sail power, while the old policy of the Navy had been to give full sail power and auxiliary steam power. And now I say that there is no fast steamer in the world, whether employed for naval or commercial purposes, which has full sail power. There is no single vessel in the world which is able to steam fourteen knots an hour that has full sail power, and if naval architects are ever able to reconcile the difficulty and give to a steamer full sail power, while it has at the same time its maximum or full steam power, all I can say is that the problem has never yet been solved.

It was hardly courteous in my colleague to speak to me about voting blindly for any proposition in this House. I leave it to the House to determine which of the two knows the most of a question exclusively under the control of my colleague. On the other hand, I have given the most careful attention to this subject, not without some fondness for the problems involved, and have not only carefully read every word of the specifications as to the construction of the engines and machinery and the plans upon which the vessels have been designed, but have also compared them with great pains not only with the letter-press description of foreign vessels but with the drawings of them, which is the proper mode of instituting a comparison.

But a compromise has been made in the construction of the Atlanta and the Boston. Let there be no misunderstanding about that. These vessels are designed to develop a great steam and offensive power, but they will not be as weatherly vessels as if constructed on a different plan. But, Mr. Chairman, it should be remembered that there is no part of the Boston or Atlanta which has not a freeboard above nine feet of their load water-line; and nine feet above the load water-line is about two feet greater, I venture to assert, than the average height on vessels engaged in trade between Liverpool and New York; and merchant vessels of two feet less freeboard have weatherly qualities.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have read all of the evidence that has been given to the public, and have taken pains to examine as far as I could all other testimony bearing upon the construction of these cruisers. I believe with the gentleman from New York that they will prove to be a very great success; but I desire to call the attention of the committee to this consideration, that if I am wrong and if the gentleman from New York is wrong, if the critics are right and if every criticism made upon these cruisers is well founded, all the more reason is there for giving them guns of a high power. Because all that has been said against them is in derogation of their capacity for speed, and we can make up for that deficiency by giving them guns of greater power. If the Chicago, which is estimated to have a speed of fourteen knots, shall be found capable of only twelve knots, I repeat all the more reason is there that she should have these 8-inch rifles such as the plan provides for. Whether these vessels are commerce-destroyers or not, they will be called upon to meet similar cruisers of other powers armed with all the powerful guns such as all nations but our own are now manufacturing and use to arm their navies with.

I have recently heard it stated, and I believe it to be true, that the English Government has within a year made a large appropriation for a complete rearmament of the English navy, being dissatisfied with the guns which they now have, and which, as they are, are far superior to any guns that this nation possesses.

Mr. Chairman, we have at the disposal of the Navy Department four kinds of ordnance. The best that we have is the converted rifle, which is a low-power gun. It is incapable of giving a muzzle velocity of more than 1,400 or 1,500 feet per second and such a gun would not arm our cruisers, whatever use we are to put them to, against the cruisers rating on the same grade of other powers. I rather infer from some remarks that fell from the gentleman in charge of this bill that it is the intention to arm these vessels with the converted rifles. I know of no other provision of law, and the gentleman has not called to our attention any other kind of gun or any other means of arming these vessels than this I have stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. I have but one single proposition which I want to advance. There seems to be no difficulty or no disagreement on either side of this House as to one main proposition, namely, that we require a navy, such a one as will be able to compete offensively or defensively with the navies of the world. There is no dispute as to that proposition.

As to the pending amendment, the only dispute seems to be as to whether the vessels now in course of construction will be a success. But there is no dispute as to another proposition, namely, that under any circumstances we have no guns for these vessels. Therefore the main proposition, and the only one I wish to call your attention to, is this: that we ought at least to go on with the building of these guns whether they are fit for these vessels or not or whether these vessels will be fit vessels or not. There can be no loss in building these new guns. You can use them in any other vessel. The loss at least will be but a trifle. Vessels can be built upon which you may place these new guns. It takes not less than a year to build the guns that, according to the best judgment of our ordnance and engineer officers, should be built to go on these vessels.

Then I ask you, why should you for a moment hesitate in giving an appropriation for the purpose of building guns? And why ask the question as to whether the vessels now in course of construction will be a success or not? We must have some other guns than those we have got now. And why not start and build those guns even outside of all questions with reference to the vessels now under construction?

The CHAIRMAN. Eight minutes remain of the time to be controlled by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. This amendment should not be determined by the committee on any merely facetious appeal—as, for example, "if we are to have vessels we ought to have guns." Nobody will contradict that. Neither should it be determined by the discussion of matters not relevant to the subject under discussion.

The Committee on Appropriations have not in any way exhibited the least hostility to the building up of the Navy. I think if the Secretary of the Navy was consulted on that point he would not make such a declaration. For myself I do not believe there are any considerable number of the Representatives on either side of the House who do not esteem the Navy and its brave officers, and want to make it what it should be and what it is not now.

But we have said this, after a careful and critical investigation of this subject, that with the money already expended, to be expended, and with the money appropriated in this bill, in the aggregate $584,000, there is no immediate necessity now for adding to that amount $449,000 more, thus giving at this time more than a million of money in this particular direction. That is the position of the committee; not in hostility to the building and trial of guns, but as to the amount that shall be given this year. And we say, or a majority of the committee say, after a careful consideration, that $584,000 is a sufficient amount.

I was very much struck with the language of the gentleman from California [Mr. SUMNER], when he said in his speech yesterday it did not matter how high science went in reference to increasing the resisting power of ironclads, some one immediately came along and invented a projectile that would pierce the armor of those vessels.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in order to satisfy my own mind. Is there available for the purchase of the armament of these vessels the sum of money the gentleman named—over $500,000—not appropriated to other purposes?

Mr. RANDALL. I said this: that with the money already given and with the amount of money to be given in this bill there is about $584,000 to be used in the construction and purchase of guns which can be placed aboard these cruisers.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Now, I wish to know whether that money is available for the purchase of the armament mentioned and described by the advisory board?

Mr. RANDALL. I am not responsible for the estimates; because I know by a long service here what estimates mean and how often these estimates are duplicated in different forms. I say again, there is $584,000 that has been and can be used to place guns aboard the cruisers, and I, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, after having given diligent inquiry and investigation to this subject, am not willing to vote, as the proposition of the gentleman from New York would compel us to do, to give over a million of money for that purpose. That is the point in controversy, and that is all that is in controversy. There is no exhibition of hostility at all to the subject-matter.

I do not want any gentleman here to claim to be a better friend of the Navy than I am. I was born within fifteen minutes' walk of what was in old times the central navy-yard of the United States; now, I am sorry to say, dismantled by order of the Secretary of the Navy, who tells us that he is not willing to reopen any of these yards unless he is compelled to do so by an order from Congress.

In case of an emergency, which I do not anticipate at all, the United States can buy the guns that are now being constructed.

Mr. REED. Where?

Mr. RANDALL. She has a market to buy from of private establishments in England, in France, and in Germany, and she has another further advantage in that she can get these guns without paying any customs duty. And I say deliberately to this side of the House, that if they expect there shall continue to be economy in the administration of these various Departments they must sustain the Committee on Appropriations when they give intelligent reasons for their recommendations.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the sum now appropriated will furnish these vessels with armament?

Mr. RANDALL. Not entirely; and I have never claimed it would.

Mr. REED. How much?

Mr. RANDALL. I want to deal frankly and truthfully about this matter.

Mr. REED. I would rather the gentleman would deal precisely with us. How much will the money furnish, how many guns?

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose a hundred-ton gun will cost $50,000.

Mr. REED. How many guns suitable for these cruisers will be furnished by the appropriation as the bill now stands?

Mr. RANDALL. An adequate amount, with the guns taken from the dismantled ships, an adequate amount in time for the armament of these vessels when completed, as I think.

Mr. REED. How many high-power guns will the sums already appropriated furnish? Can the gentleman answer me?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not say exactly. But I say distinctly that the money which the Department has to-day, together with what we give for the next fiscal year in this bill, is enough, with the guns now within the possession of the Government, to adequately arm these vessels when completed, in my judgment.

Mr. REED. What does the gentleman mean by "adequately arm?" With high-power guns?

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] have time to point out to the committee the provisions in the bill which carry this discretion to use money for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. The discretion is absolute.

Mr. HISCOCK. Point out the provisions in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I have them here.

Mr. REED. Point them out.

Mr. RANDALL. They are in existing law and in the provisions of this bill.

Mr. REED. What provisions of the bill? Let the gentleman point that out?

Mr. RANDALL. Here they are.

Mr. REED. Let the gentleman name the lines and the page.

Mr. RANDALL. I have them here and will insert them.

Mr. REED. State them now.

Mr. TALBOTT. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. By unanimous consent we can extend the time for debate, as we fixed the limit in the first instance.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER and others. Regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I think great privilege has been given to the other side.

Mr. REED. The gentleman promised us a frank statement.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want the gentleman to point out the provisions of the bill that contain the discretion.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. REED. By whom?

The CHAIRMAN. By the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] and others.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. DORSHEIMER to insert, after line 323, the following:

To complete the ordnance outfit of the said vessels, $449,029.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 81, noes 100.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CALKINS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HUTCHINS and Mr. CALKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 93, noes 119.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out the last word. I think there is now an opportunity, when there is no regulation of the House cutting off debate, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to show where in this bill there is any appropriation for guns for these new cruisers, and what kind of guns they are to be.

Mr. RANDALL. The House has determined the question.

Mr. REED. I was in hopes the gentleman would answer.

Mr. RANDALL. I did answer the gentleman, but I can not make him listen.

Mr. REED. I was in hopes the gentleman, for his own sake, would make the explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. I can take care of myself.

Mr. REED. I wish the gentleman would take care of the exact facts of the case.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not unfriendly to the Navy.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has made the statement on the floor that there are certain provisions in this bill——

Mr. RANDALL. I have told the gentleman over and over again that I will publish them.

Mr. REED. Why not send them up to be read? I desire to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has had an opportunity to point out these provisions of law and he has not pointed them out, and we are unable to find out where they are.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Clerk to read them; I do this of my own volition.

Mr. REED. Of course of his "own volition;" I am not trying to drive him anywhere.

Mr. RANDALL. We have got a strong case.

Mr. REED. Well, how will you make it stronger by——

Mr. RANDALL. By the facts.

Mr. REED. Let us have them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the statement sent up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriated for steel rifled cannon in 1883 and reappropriated for 1884 ($50,000 of which is still unexpended)	$100,000
Allotted from appropriation for the steel cruisers for 1884	234,000
Amount appropriated for ordnance and ordnance material 1884 (current)	150,000
Amount in this bill for ordnance and ordnance material (current)	100,000
Total	584,000

Mr. REED. That is all in the last year's bill, is it not?
Mr. RANDALL. It is not.
Mr. REED. What part of it is in this bill?
Mr. CALKINS. The $224,000 is in last year's bill.
Mr. EATON. Let the statement be read again.
Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise to a point of order. Is there anything before the committee?
The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is to strike out the last word. The Chair will direct that the paper be read again.
The Clerk again read the statement.
Mr. REED. One hundred thousand dollars of that is in this bill, and none of it specifically for this object.
Mr. CALKINS. Inasmuch as the matter has gone thus far, the House should understand precisely the condition of affairs. The sum of $224,000, which, as I understand, is a part of this statement, was appropriated last year; am I right in that?
Mr. RANDALL. Make your statement.
Mr. CALKINS. And that amount, as I have shown by a tabulated statement, will all be expended, if it is not now expended, in the execution of contracts already made. One hundred thousand dollars—$50,000 of which has not been expended—$50,000 of which lapped over into 1884, as I understand, was appropriated last year.
The only amount, as I understand, in this bill is the $100,000, the expenditure of which is discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy. I may be mistaken; but as I understand that is the exact situation of affairs.
Mr. HISCOCK. How discretionary?
Mr. CALKINS. The Bureau of Ordnance has its usual appropriation.
Mr. HISCOCK. It is only right to have the record complete.
Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise to close debate on all amendments.
The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee. The pro forma amendment, as the Chair understands, is withdrawn.
Mr. HORR. I renew the amendment. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] desires to mislead this House; and I want to ask him this simple question——
Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire why the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] makes that assertion. [Laughter.]
Mr. HORR. I protest against questions of that kind; for I had supposed the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not intend to mislead the House; and no man knows better than he that this item was stricken out of the bill in committee for the sole reason that he did not believe these guns ought to be built at the present time.
Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is utterly mistaken. If he undertakes to violate the rules of the House and communicate what occurred in committee, he ought always to have truth on his side. [Applause.]
Mr. HORR. I am not going to violate the rules of the House in any way, but I do believe it is wrong for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to attempt to make this House believe that there is an appropriation for the manufacture of guns for the armament of these ships when he ought to know that this appropriation was left out on the theory that there was no enemy in sight, and that it was not needed.
Mr. RANDALL. I said that on the floor.
Mr. HORR. The gentleman stated that, as I remember, on the floor of the House; not in committee.
Mr. RANDALL. Why did you say in committee?
Mr. HORR. The gentleman stated here in general debate, if I recollect aright, that the reason the appropriation was left out was because there was no enemy in sight and that the guns were not needed. Am I not right in that?
Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. It never was stricken out in committee. It never was reported from the subcommittee to the general committee. The motion was to insert.
Mr. HORR. I understand; but in the general debate here this question was brought up, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania tried to explain on the floor of the House the reason this appropriation was left out. He did not claim at that time that this money was in the bill. Why? Because it is not there.
Mr. RANDALL. I do not say that there is any part of the $449,000 estimated for in the bill, and we did not intend it should be in the bill.
Mr. REED. There is no money in the bill at all.
Mr. RANDALL. Then it will not be squandered.
Mr. HORR. Why, Mr. Chairman, it was well understood by all of us on the committee—and I am not violating any confidence—that it was not the purpose of the committee to put this matter in. The gentleman is frank enough now to say it is not in. That is what I want understood. There is not a dollar of this money which was applied for by the Secretary of the Navy appropriated. You admit that?
Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.
Mr. HORR. That is all there is of this case.
Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is on the committee, and he ought to understand what he was about.
The CHAIRMAN. Is the formal amendment withdrawn by the gentleman from Michigan?
Mr. HORR. Yes; I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completing the Mohican at the Mare Island navy-yard, $50,000.
For care and safe-keeping of the iron-clad monitors now in the hands of the contractors, when they shall have been turned over to the Government by said contractors, $5,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to add the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Naval line officers may be detailed as instructors in mathematics or other branches of learning in any school or college according to the act of February 26, 1859, but the total number of all naval officers so detailed shall not exceed forty.

Mr. RANDALL. That is subject to a point of order.
Mr. BELFORD. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will not make the point of order.
Mr. RANDALL. Yes; I must insist on it.
Mr. BELFORD. I should like to know what it is.
Mr. VALENTINE. Let the point of order be stated.
Mr. RANDALL. It is new legislation and not in the direction of economy.
Mr. BELFORD. I ask to be heard on that point of order.
Mr. RANDALL. I will hear the gentleman on the surplus in the Treasury. [Laughter.]
Mr. BELFORD. I have the right to discuss the point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.
Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, we have so many officers of the line and of the staff. I do not know about the line officers except they are being used at present to draw the Democratic party to destruction. [Laughter.]
What I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, is this: We have colleges all over the country to which we can detail naval as well as military officers. Yesterday my friend from New York—I refer to the blushing, suffusing, sunset gentleman, [laughter]—presented to this House a table showing how many officers there are in Washington. I have in my State three colleges—the State University, the Agricultural College, and the Military and Naval School at Canyon City. I went to the Secretary of the Navy and asked him to detail one of these naval officers to serve as a teacher of mathematics and other sciences at the Agricultural College at Fort Collins. Now, if you can not use these men in the Navy, why do you not send them to educate the youth of the West?
The gentleman says it does not reduce expenditures. If these men are put upon the retired-list they are liable to be so detailed by the Secretary of the Navy. They may be sent to Ohio or Indiana or to any other State of this Union. The pretense that it is subject to the point of order because it does not reduce expenditure is absolutely idle and utterly indefensible.
I do hope my friend from Pennsylvania, who is so anxious to protect the interests of the Navy, will abandon his point of order and allow me to get in an amendment to this bill, under which, and only under which, I can have detailed from the Navy and from the Army an officer to educate the pupils of my State in the State University, the Agricultural College, and the college at Canyon City.
Mr. RANDALL. To the merits of the proposition I have no objection.
Mr. BELFORD. Why then raise the point of order?
Mr. RANDALL. The practice in the Army has permitted it. I do not wish the amendment attached here because I am anxious to proceed without further discussion. That is the reason why I made the point of order.
Since I made the point of order I have received the following letter from the Secretary of the Navy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 5, 1884.

SIR: In order to enable naval officers to be detailed as instructors in any branches, except steam-engineering and iron-ship building, it will be advisable to have the accompanying clause placed upon the naval appropriation bill:
Naval line officers may be detailed as instructors in mathematics, or other branches of learning, in any schools or colleges according to the act of February 26, 1859, but the total number of all naval officers so detailed shall not exceed forty.
Very respectfully,

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the same as the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado and I will withdraw my point of order and accept it.
Mr. BELFORD. It is the same.
The amendment was adopted.
Mr. CALKINS. I offer the following amendment:

For the construction of seven steel vessels, namely, one cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and two light gunboats of 750 tons each, as recommended in the report of the naval advisory board dated October 25, 1883, and in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy of December 1, 1883, $2,300,000; and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels and to procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board in said report; and said vessels shall be designed and constructed in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the naval appropriation acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, authorizing the construction of four steel cruisers.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I make the point of order that there is a bill now pending before the House of the same import as this amendment. I make the further point that there is no law for it. It is new legislation.

Mr. CALKINS. The point of order which the gentleman has stated is probably not a good one, but that it is new legislation might perhaps be sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from New York makes both.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I notice in the appropriation bill, when these new steel cruisers were authorized, a provision for their construction was embodied in that bill; and unless an amendment is in order under the general authority of this Government to construct vessels, of course the amendment I have proposed is subject to the point of order.

I offer this now, however, as a matter of duty. I desire that there shall be such proper legislation come before this House as will enable us to make a proper increase of our Navy, with a view to its efficiency.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all right, but the gentleman himself concedes that the point of order is good against him.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not concede it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must hold that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask simply to have published in this connection a little statement from the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the cost.

Mr. COX, of New York. With reference to the cost of what?

Mr. CALKINS. As to the cost of the vessels embodied in this bill. The statement to which I refer I now send to the desk.

It is as follows:

NOTE.—The cost of the seven proposed vessels, as estimated by the advisory board, and stated by the Secretary of the Navy on page 7 of the annual report, is as follows:

Type.	Hull.	Machinery.	Ordnance.	Equipment	Total.
Chigago	$650,000	$350,000	$225,000	$70,000	$1,295,000
Boston	450,000	260,000	168,000	58,000	936,000
Dolphin	232,000	175,000	50,000	25,000	482,000
Two heavy gunboats	432,000	350,000	200,000	50,000	1,032,000
Two light gunboats	264,000	154,000	80,000	40,000	538,000
Total					4,283,000

To construct the above vessels the sum of $2,300,000 will be a sufficient appropriation for the coming fiscal year, leaving the balance to be appropriated in the next annual appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ACADEMY.

For pay of professors and others——

Mr. RANDALL. Before entering upon this part of the bill I want to say to the committee that there is no change whatever from existing law in reference to the Naval Academy except what grows out of the increase.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the various clauses with reference to the Naval Academy.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding at the end of line 431 what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 431:

"That hereafter there shall be allowed at the Naval Academy cadets equal to half the number of Congressional districts, to be appointed alternately from the several districts."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is evident to everybody, I think, that until we have more ships and a larger fighting force we do not need to go on increasing the number of our officers for the Navy; while at the same time I do not assent to the proposition that when the Government admits to the Naval Academy students and gives them a free education it obliges the people of this country forever thereafter to pay and support them. Nevertheless I think the right way to do is to lessen the number of cadets admitted to the institution. That is the object of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 72.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARINE CORPS.

For pay of officers on the active-list, as follows: For 1 colonel commandant, 1 colonel, 2 lieutenant-colonels, 1 adjutant and inspector, 1 quartermaster, 1 paymaster, 4 majors, 2 assistant quartermasters, 1 judge-advocate-general United States Navy, 19 captains, 30 first lieutenants, and 22 second lieutenants, $185,240. And from and after the passage of this act there shall be no appointments, except by promotion, to fill vacancies occurring in the list of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps until the number of such officers shall have been reduced, by casualties or otherwise, below 75; and after the number of officers shall be reduced as above provided the whole number of commissioned officers on the active-list in the Marine Corps shall not exceed 75.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to strike out of the paragraph just read all after the word "five," in line 445, down to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "and after the number of officers shall be reduced as above provided the whole number of commissioned officers on the active-list in the Marine Corps shall not exceed 75."

Mr. THOMAS. This amendment, if adopted, will place the promotions in the Marine Corps only in harmony with the provisions which have been incorporated with reference to the other officers for whose pay provision is made in this bill. The amendment affecting the promotion of officers of the line and staff was stricken out by the Committee of the Whole, and it seems to be fair that promotions should not be stopped in the Marine Corps since it has not been stopped in the other branches of the service. A comparison of the number of officers in this military branch of the naval service, for their duties are purely military, shows that there is nothing like the same proportion of officers in the Marine Corps as there is in the infantry branch of the Army service, while they stand exactly upon the same footing. I hope that this amendment will be agreed to, and that the promotions will be allowed in the Marine Corps as they are in the line and staff. As the law now stands, no change having been made in the law of 1883 by this bill, this amendment places them upon an equality. It will be remembered, of course, that the amendment proposed by the committee was stricken out, and hence the necessity for this. It is but fair to this branch that the words which I have suggested be stricken out, so that there shall be one promotion for every two vacancies, as in the other grades.

Mr. RANDALL. I will explain the occasion for the insertion of this language. At the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress a provision was made that the number of commissioned officers in the Marine Corps should be seventy-five. In other words, that there should be no promotions to vacancies from that period until the number did reach seventy-five. Well, in due time the law as then provided reduced the number to seventy-five, and the Department held that that was the execution of the law, and they immediately went back to the original number.

The object of the committee now is that this seventy-five, as fixed in the bill, shall be the aggregate number of the commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and that hereafter it may stand so, and not permit the Department when they reach seventy-five to say that the purpose of the law is accomplished and they will return again to the original number. I do not think there was much objection in the committee to this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken. The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House resumed its session.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the head of "Marine Corps:"

For ten clerks and two messengers, $16,035; payments to discharged soldiers for clothing undrawn, $20,000; transportation of officers traveling under orders without troops, $8,000; commutation of quarters for officers where there are no public buildings, $10,000; in all $54,035.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, in line 465, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$4,000," and make the total footing of the clause $48,035.

Mr. CALKINS. What is that amendment?

Mr. HUTCHINS. It is the transfer, by recommendation of the Secretary, of $4,000 from the item at line 466 to the item at line 489.

Mr. CALKINS. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For repairs of barracks, and rent of buildings to be used for the manufacture of clothing, stores for supplies, and offices of assistant quartermaster at Philadelphia, and for hire of quarters where there are no public buildings, $4,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. By direction of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, in lines 488 and 489, strike out "$4,000," and insert "$14,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the third and concluding section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That no officer whose name is borne on the retired-list of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall hold position in the civil service or other employment of the Government and draw the salary or compensation thereof, together with his pay as a retired officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps: Provided, That any such retired officer accepting a position in the civil service or other employment of the Government may, at the time of acceptance, elect to take the salary of such position or in lieu to retain his pay as a retired officer.

Mr. CALKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section add the following proviso:

"But the restrictions of this section shall not apply to any officer below the rank of major in the Army or Marine Corps or commander in the Navy, unless he has been retired by reason of wounds received in service."

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. What amount of pay would you exclude by this amendment from the operation of the proviso?

Mr. CALKINS. It would exclude all below the rank of major.

Mr. RANDALL. But as to the amount of pay, would it bring in all under $2,500?

Mr. CALKINS. I do not know what the pay of major is on the retired-list. It is three-fourths of full pay. My recollection is that a major receives less than $2,500.

Mr. RANDALL. The principle involved is what I want to get at; that is, that in the United States, where there are so many people seeking positions, there should not be anybody securing two pays out of the Treasury of the United States and hold two offices.

Mr. CALKINS. And the only exception I try to make is that this shall not apply to men who have lost both arms or who have lost both legs in the service of their country.

Mr. MAYO. I have listened for four or five days to the debate on this bill, and I have been struck with the novel views of many on this floor as they presented their reasons why we should not have an increase of the Navy; some of them even saying that we should not have a navy at all. They would be satisfied with having two or three logs tied together and floating the flag of the United States over them.

Gentlemen appear to base their position upon the ground that there is no nation in the world which wishes to fight the United States. My reading in history teaches me that all the great wars of the world from its creation down to the present day commenced about little or nothing. Those of us who, like the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], are familiar with the Scriptures and can tell when the millennium is coming, recollect that a woman persuading a man to eat a sour apple brought about that great war in which the devil and his angels sought to storm the ramparts of heaven. We know that an equally trivial thing as another woman and another apple brought on the Trojan war. We also have heard, sir, that the great war between the Lilliputians and the Brobdingnags was brought on by the question as to which end of an egg should be broken. We have also heard in later days of the Franco-Prussian war. Does any gentleman know how that war was brought on? Why, when the Emperor of the French happened to be breakfasting one morning with Prince Bismarck he observed that the Prince's morning drink was champagne mixed with lager. The great Emperor of the French became indignant that the celebrated wine of his country should be thus polluted, and another great war came on. [Laughter.]

So we see wars are produced by trivial circumstances. And these gentlemen who speak in these balmy times of peace against preparing for war remind me very much of the Arkansaw Traveler. Sitting in front of his dilapidated dwelling, with nearly all the roof off it, he is playing the violin. He is asked, "Why don't you mend your roof, so as to keep out the rain?" "Why, stranger, it is not raining now." "But some day it will rain; and why don't you do it when it does rain?" He answered, "Oh, a man can't go out and mend his roof when it rains." [Laughter.]

Now, if I had my will I would, on the score of real economy, appropriate a hundred millions of money to build a navy. I would appropriate it not only for the purpose of building a navy, but of developing the iron and timber resources of the country and giving employment to those men whose abilities could be utilized as skilled artificers; and we would thus also give an impetus to what we want above all things, a merchant marine.

Therefore, if I could control this matter I would at once commence to build a first-class navy. I would build it of our own materials, and when it is built employment would be given to the great number of men we have along this coast of ours, who would make the best seamen in the world.

You talk about there being so many officers here in comparison with the number of men. Could that be different when during the late war President Lincoln announced that with his fleet of gunboats they had gone wherever it was a little moist? Do you propose to turn out all those gallant officers who helped to put us down and performed their duty to you simply because you are too stingy to give them ships to go aboard?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CALKINS, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill has now been completed. By direction of the committee, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], to come in after line 89 of the bill, will now be taken up.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Perhaps the gentleman will not press his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MORSE. I do not.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert, after line 89, the following:

"And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers, clerks, or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular Navy, in the grade having graduated pay held by such officer at the time of the passage of this act. And the record of all service of every such officer shall be entered in full opposite his name, in the appropriate columns of the Navy Register, in the same manner as service in the regular Navy is credited: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer Army or Navy."

Mr. MORSE. I would like to ask unanimous consent to modify that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment before a vote is taken upon it.

Mr. MORSE. I modify my amendment by inserting, between the words "additional" and "pay," near the close of the amendment, the words "or longevity;" so that it will read:

Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional or longevity pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer Army or Navy.

Mr. RANDALL. That is merely to do a matter of justice to certain officers of the Navy, so that they shall receive proper recognition on the Register.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, had made sundry amendments to the bill, and directed him to report the same with the amendments back to the House with a recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill as amended passed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. If no separate vote is called for, the amendments will be acted upon in gross.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This being a general appropriation bill, the rule of the House requires the question on its passage to be determined by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 259, nays 1, not voting 60; as follows:

Mr. PENDLETON. I present two petitions from the German Veterans' Society of Ohio; also a petition of the August Willich Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Cincinnati, Ohio, purporting to be signed by honorably discharged officers, soldiers, and sailors of the Union Army and Navy during the war of 1861–'65, praying for the passage of an act granting a land-warrant of one hundred and sixty acres of land, without the condition of settlement, to every officer or soldier or sailor who served in the Union Army and has been honorably discharged from the service and to the widows and minors of those who died without receiving it. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present joint resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which I ask may be read.

The joint resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Joint resolution relative to foreign cheap labor.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we earnestly appeal to our Senators and Representatives in Congress to labor diligently and vote for the passage of some such bill as that introduced by M. A. FORAN, to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners, aliens, under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward copies of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 28, 1884.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of citizens of Apalachicola, Fla., praying an appropriation for the erection of a custom-house and post-office building at that place. The petition asks for the modest sum of $4,000 for the erection of a suitable building for a custom-house and post-office. This petition is signed by the leading citizens and business men of Apalachicola.

The petition states that the safety of the lives of those who go upon the sea in ships, the interests and demands of commerce, and the prosperity of the port of Apalachicola require that you will secure the erection of a suitable light-house on the west end of Dog Island, at the entrance of the harbor of Apalachicola.

The petition contains the following statistics: Number of foreign vessels and tonnage entered at Apalachicola, via Dog Island, in the past eighteen months, 108 vessels, 50,154 tons. Coastwise craft, which are numerous, are not included in the above statistics. Number of vessels stranded during the same period of time in consequence of there being no light-house 2 vessels, 1,180 tons.

This petition is signed by Samuel P. Nuford, mayor of Apalachicola; George H. Patton, collector of revenue; Seth M. Sawyer, collector of customs; Jos. R. Pickett, pilot; William E. Peake, master of schooner John L. Kranz; H. Page & Sons, importers; and a large number of other citizens, including the merchants and business men of the place. The persons signing this petition are men of character and interest, and their statements are entirely reliable.

Apalachicola is situated at the mouth of the Apalachicola River, which is formed by the confluence of the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers, which pass through some of the finest and most productive lands in the Atlantic States. Its importance and that of the adjacent country demands the favorable consideration of the Government for this and other improvements.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand the petition of Jesse Herd, a resident of Boonville, county of Cooper, State of Missouri, who was a soldier, and by reason of his services became entitled to a bounty of $100, but by reason of his failure to apply for that bounty prior to July 1, 1880, he is estopped now from receiving it because of the limitation, and he prays Congress to pass a bill to enable him to receive the bounty that is due him, either by the extension of the time within which such claims may be presented, or by the repeal of that legislation. I ask that the petition be received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks these special bounty matters have generally been referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the petition going to the Committee on Pensions, though it properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will give the reference the Senator desires.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go to the Committee on Pensions, as the Chair suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of Rev. Albert D. Spalter, of Rumney Depot, N. H., praying for a pension in recognition of the heroic gallantry and patriotic services of his grandfather, Moses Child, in the French and Indian and Revolutionary wars. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and I ask that committee to take prompt action on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I present a memorial in the nature of a protest. It is a printed paper with the names printed to it, but accompanying it is a letter addressed to myself from D. W. Bushyhead, L. B. Bell, and John G. Schmuska, of the Cherokee delegation, protesting against the passage of the bill authorizing the construction of a certain railroad through the Indian Territory. Because the letter is written and accompanies this paper I ask that it be received for the consideration of Congress and that it may be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who I think have charge of the question of railroads through the Indian Territory.

Mr. DAWES. That jurisdiction has been divided between the Indian Committee and the Committee on Railroads. The Indian Committee have one bill and the Committee on Railroads another.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask what is the nature of the bill referred to.

Mr. CONGER. This is a printed protest, signed by certain Indian chiefs of the Cherokee and Creek Nations, but it is accompanied by a letter to me, signed by these persons, requesting that the matter be brought before Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. The particular case referred to has been before the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. DAWES. All these matters have been reported back from the Indian Committee. If they have been reported by the Committee on Railroads, the paper should be laid on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. The matter has been under consideration by the Committee on Railroads. I am not quite sure whether a report has been made or not, but that particular subject has been before that committee.

Mr. INGALLS. There are two bills providing for the granting of the right of way through the Indian Territory to railroad corporations on the Calendar, one of which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs and the other from the Committee on Railroads. I suggest that the communication lie upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. The bills referred to in this communication are Senate bill 50 and House bill 3961.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 50 is reported and on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. Then I ask that this memorial be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan presents a certain protest against the passage of a bill providing for a railway through the Indian Territory, and asks that the protest be printed and laid upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. With the accompanying letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter and protest. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES. The select committee appointed by the Senate at its last session and continued at this session instructed to inquire into the condition of the Indians in Dakota and Montana have attended to that duty and have instructed me to report a bill. This bill is accompanied by a written report and documents which the people of Dakota take so much interest in that I shall ask, after the bill is read the second time, to have referred to the Committee on Printing a resolution to print 1,000 extra copies for the use of the Senate.

The bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES. Now I ask that the resolution may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed before the Senate when resolutions are reached.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose without any motion the report and accompanying documents will be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1316) for the relief of William W. Armstrong; and

A bill (S. 1267) for the relief of Alfred Huckaby.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (S. 63) for the relief of William H. Morgan, and the bill (S. 583) for the relief of William H. Morgan, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bills were indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1041) for the relief of the heir of Constantine Brumidi, reported it with amendments.

THE SARATOGA MONUMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred an order for printing additional copies of the report on Senate bill 1309, to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument, to report the same back and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The order was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the report on Senate bill 1309, entitled "A bill to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument," be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1756) to authorize the Mississippi River Commission to make agreements in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 1757) for the relief of Lucy Ann Lee and Allen G. Lee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 1758) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, a chaplain in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1759) for the relief of Marcus C. Hawley & Co., of San Francisco, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1760) for the relief of Rev. E. C. Chirouse, late United States Indian agent; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (by request) introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (S. 1761) for the relief of the heirs of William Greason, of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1762) for the relief of Henry C. Craig, of Georgetown, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1763) for the relief of S. F. Dolbear, J. M. Graham, H. A. Myers, and G. F. Shaffer, all of Washington, D. C.;

A bill for (S. 1764) the relief of W. A. T. Maddox;

A bill (S. 1765) for the relief of Peter Horning, of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1766) for the relief of J. Henry Albers;

A bill (S. 1767) for the relief of Samuel Johnston, Gustav Giesler, and P. S. Kemon, all of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1768) for the relief of E. W. Rank, W. Hendley, and W. Krohr, all of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1769) for the relief of Elizabeth Skelly, of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1770) for the relief of Dorothea Grupé;

A bill (S. 1771) for the relief of Sarah Butler, of Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 1772) for the relief of August Grages, of Washington, D. C.; and

A bill (S. 1773) for the relief of Mary S. Widdicomb, of Washington, D. C.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER also introduced a bill (S. 1774) for the relief of William Tabb; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1775) providing for the purchase of Forbes's historical art collection; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1776) granting a pension to James H. Reid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1777) for the relief of Harvey Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1778) for the erection of a post-office building at Lynn, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 1779) for the relief of the legal representatives of Solomon Cohen, of Savannah, Ga.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1780) granting a pension to Benjamin Goodwin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senate bill No. 1673, it appears from the RECORD, was introduced by me. On the face of the bill it does not so appear, but it is stated that it was introduced by my colleague [Mr. BECK]. I know nothing of the matter, and never heard of the bill until I saw the statement in the RECORD. It was introduced by mistake. My colleague says that somebody gave it to him for me, stating that he came to me to introduce the bill, as I had agreed to do, and not finding me in my seat in the Senate he went to my colleague, who presented it for me, as he thought. Neither of us is willing to assume the paternity of this bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I therefore ask consent of the Senate that it be withdrawn, or that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it lie on the table. That is the best disposition I know of to make of it. My colleague will concur with me in this statement.

Mr. BECK. On the morning of the 28th of February I find by the RECORD the following occurred:

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 1673) to regulate the retiring of Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I introduced that bill for my colleague, as I thought, and hence it was credited to him, a young gentleman telling me that he had agreed to introduce it and that he was absent. I have received several letters complaining that there are matters in the bill which ought not to be considered. I know nothing about it, and I hope it will be withdrawn from the committee. It was imposed on us by somebody.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Journal shows correctly that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] introduced the bill.

Mr. BECK. It makes no difference. We both agree about it

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1673) to regulate the retiring of Army officers, and that the bill be laid upon the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is entered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. FAIR, it was Ordered, That Daniel Connor, whose bill for relief was adversely reported from the Committee on Claims, have leave to withdraw the papers relating to said bill from the files of the Senate upon leaving certified copies upon the Senate files.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of the bill reported by the select committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into the condition of the Indians in Montana and Dakota, together with the report of the committee and accompanying documents.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the present consideration of the following order:

Ordered, That Senate bill No. 1448, entitled "A bill to remove certain burdens on the American merchant-marine, encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

The supply is exhausted, I am informed.

The order was agreed to.

PATENT INFRINGEMENT SUITS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate Order of Business 137, under the eighth rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to move that the Senate pass over the Calendar under Rule VIII, and take up the first order of business under Rule IX, which is the bill regulating practice in patent suits. It will probably develop some discussion, and I think by taking it up now we can finish the bill to-day. I make this motion for the reason that I shall possibly be compelled to be absent at some time next week, and we have special orders for the first days of the week, so that if we delay taking this bill up until 2 o'clock to-day we shall probably not finish it to-day and it will get in the way of other orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 63, being the bill (S. 1115) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents. The question is on that motion.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to taking up this bill at the present time. When it is taken up, however, I desire to substitute for this order Senate bill 1115, Order of Business No. 226, being House bill 3925. I do not wish any vote of the Senate to interfere with my liberty to make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order, the Chair thinks, for the Senator from Connecticut after this bill is taken up to move to postpone it and take up the bill he has named; but the simpler way would be, if the Senator desires to test the sense of the Senate on which of the bills it will consider, to raise the question now.

Mr. PLATT. I move then to amend the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not amendable. The only way the Senator can reach the bill named by the Senator from Connecticut, the Chair thinks, is to decline to agree to the motion of the Senator from Indiana, and then to vote on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, if he makes it, to take up the other bill.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps the Senator from Indiana will modify his motion so as to take up that bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I will with the consent of the Senate modify my motion as the Senator from Connecticut has suggested, but——

Mr. INGALLS. I recognize the importance of the measure that the Senator from Indiana desires to bring before the Senate, and I will unite with him at any suitable time in an effort to bring the bill up for discussion; but I suggest that if we are every day to take up out of order bills that are to consume in debate the entire interval which has been reserved for the consideration of cases not objected to upon the Calendar there will be very serious detriment to the public interest; and therefore, in no spirit of hostility to the bill but fully recognizing its importance, I hope the Senate will negative both the propositions and adhere to the rules, and proceed now to the consideration of cases upon the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if he expects to be absent next Tuesday.

Mr. HARRISON. Probably not.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that I have taken great interest in this bill. I believe that one in every 1,300 citizens of Massachusetts takes out a patent every year, and I have given a great deal of attention to the subject; but I have a very severe cold and can not take any considerable part in the debate to-day and make myself heard without great discomfort to myself and the Senate. If the Senator expects to be here on Tuesday next—the special orders he refers to are for Wednesday next, the first of them, at least—I wish he would make his motion then rather than to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, we have already an order (which perhaps it would be out of order for me to explain in legislative session) for Monday. It is not certain I think that we shall dispose of it on that day, and if not we are advised that on Tuesday there will be a proposition to continue the discussion of that subject. Of course I would not, after the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, desire to press the consideration of this bill when he is not in a physical condition to present his views upon it, and while I doubt whether it may not result in further postponement; yet I can not doubt that with his assistance we shall be able to get the consent of the Senate to the early consideration of it, if not on Tuesday, if he will give consent that it be made the special order for that day, very soon thereafter.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be made now if there be no objection. The other matter may shove it out, but it will have the right of way after that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am willing it should be made the special order at 2 o'clock; not before that hour.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that, and I agree to it the more readily from the fact that the Senator from Oregon on my right [Mr. DOLPH] some days ago notified the Senate that at 2 o'clock to-day he would ask that business be suspended that he might address the Senate on some bill. That being so, we probably should not progress very far with this bill to-day. I will agree that it be made the special order for 2 o'clock on Tuesday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which bill does the Senator from Indiana desire to have made a special order?

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to make both of them. House bill 3925 (Order of Business 226) is on the same subject precisely with the Senate bill which has now been reached under Rule IX; but I think we all desire to substitute the House bill, as action upon the measure would be facilitated in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator will attain his object by moving to make the House bill the special order, when the text of the Senate bill can be offered as an amendment or otherwise as may be desired.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits, with a view of moving that it be made the special order for Tuesday next at 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to make the bill the special order for Tuesday next at 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to without objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. THOMAS RYAN of Kansas, managers at the conference on its part.

HALL OF RECORDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 206 now comes up under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 206) making appropriation for the purchase of ground and the erection thereon in the city of Washington of a building to be used as a hall of records, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 10, after the word "reference," to strike out the words "as recommended by the Secretary of War in his annual reports of 1879 and 1880;" and in line 13, after the words "direction of," to strike out the words "General M. C. Meigs, lately Quartermaster-General, and according to the plans heretofore prepared by him and submitted in his annual reports of the Quartermaster's Department;" and to insert:

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, on plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of State.

So as to make the bill read:

That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purchase of a site near the War Department and erection thereon of a brick and metal fire-proof building, to be used for the safe-keeping of records of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, not required in the present executive, legislative, or judicial offices for constant reference; said building to be erected under the supervision and direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, on plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of State.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no doubt that a building for the purposes named in the bill ought to be erected, but it appears to me that there ought to be some limit placed upon the discretion of the officer named as to the selection of a location.

I remember that when the matter of the construction of a Congressional Library building was under discussion in the Senate the proposition to locate the building in Judiciary Square was discussed. It was held that in accordance with the decision that had been made by the Engineer Department no foundation could be selected there, and it was entirely an inappropriate place, and besides that, the square ought to be reserved for public uses. Yet after that had been done and after we had made an appropriation for removing the jail and some other buildings which deformed that locality, without the consent of Congress and in pursuance of some authority that I have never been able to discover, either the Secretary of War or the Quartermaster-General has proceeded to locate and partially erect upon that reservation a structure for the use of the Pension Bureau, in violation as I believe of the expressed will of Congress and to the great detriment and injury of that reservation and of the surrounding property.

I think we have had enough of this kind of business, and there ought to be some declaration by Congress in the bill as to the place where this building is to be located and the amount to be expended for the site. Otherwise we may have another operation in some other portion of the city like that which has been conducted in Judiciary Square.

I wish the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] would prescribe some limit in the bill to the amount to be expended for the site and the place where the building is to be erected, because the evils that result from executive discretion have already been made painfully apparent.

Mr. PLATT. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that in the bill there appears to be no authority given to any person or officer to purchase the site. I think some amendment should be proposed which would authorize the purchase of the site.

Mr. SHERMAN. The objection stated by the Senator from Connecticut is well taken. An officer is designated to construct and erect the building, but there is no one authorized to make the purchase of a site. I do not know who should be authorized. I suppose the Secretary of War. I will move to insert in line 6, after the word "Department," the words "by the Secretary of War," so as to read:

And the same is hereby appropriated for the purchase of a site near the War Department by the Secretary of War and erection thereon of a brick and metal fire-proof building," &c.

Mr. VEST. This bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. A similar bill has passed the Senate twice and gone to the House of Representatives. But amendments were made by the committee, and I notice that nothing is said directly in regard to the site. I have drawn an amendment which I believe will meet the objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. VEST. In the twelfth line I propose to strike out the word "said" and to insert the words "the site for the building to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State, and the," putting the discretion in those Cabinet officers.

Mr. INGALLS. "To be selected?"

Mr. VEST. "To be selected."

Mr. INGALLS. That does not imply the power to purchase.

Mr. VEST. Then let it read, "to be selected and purchased."

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "purchased" would include the selection.

Mr. VEST. Very well; let it read, "to be purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State, the said building to be erected under the supervision and direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, on plans and specifications," &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is the better suggestion of the two, that the purchase be made by a single officer. This building it is understood, or at least it has been understood for some time, is to be erected on a square near the War, Navy, and State Department building. Arrangements were partially made for the purchase of a tract of ground there sufficiently large for the building a year or more ago. It was suggested at one time that the Pension Office should be built upon that site, as members of the Appropriations Committee will remember. The cost of that ground was ascertained to be about $51,000, but the Committee on Appropriations believed that there could be found public ground upon which the Pension Office building could be constructed, and therefore in making the appropriation for the construction of the Pension Office building the bill provided that it should be constructed upon ground owned by the Government, and the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War were authorized for that purpose to select any ground in the city of Washington belonging to the Government. It was under that authority, I submit to the Senator from Kansas, that the ground in Judiciary Square was selected for the erection of the Pension Office building.

Mr. INGALLS. And they might as well, had they chosen, erected it in the public reservation about the Capitol.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. There was no limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the ground to be selected. It was supposed at the time that these public officers would exercise some judgment in the selection of a site, and I think they exercised very good judgment in the selection.

Mr. INGALLS. I think they exercised very bad judgment.

Mr. ALLISON. I know the Senator from Kansas has expressed that opinion, and he is entitled to it. I think this building for the public records should be erected where the bill proposes, namely, near the War Department, and if so I can see no reason why the Secretary of War alone should not make the purchase. I have no objection, of course, to the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri, but I think the Secretary of War could make this purchase just as well as a board.

Mr. INGALLS. Did the Senator from Iowa state the precise location that had been selected of which he said the appraisement was $51,000?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; the selection is the southwest corner of New York avenue and Seventeenth street.

Mr. INGALLS. Then why not put that in the bill, so that there will be no more ranging around the city here and no discretion in the officers?

Mr. ALLISON. It would be very well to put it in the bill except that the probability is that the owners of the ground, if we should select the site in advance, would ask $1,000 or $2,000 more for the property if we agreed now to put the building there.

Mr. INGALLS. The right of condemnation exists.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not provided for in this bill, however, I would say to the Senator.

Mr. VEST. I was about to say that if we ever select a site in advance it puts the Government entirely at the mercy of the owners of the property unless we put the site upon land that already belongs to the Government. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have in every instance attempted, wherever it possibly could be done, to select as the site for public buildings lands already owned by the Government of the United States. We have the same difficulty now in regard to the city post-office. It is absolutely marvelous to find how property increases in value as soon as it is discovered that the Government has any use for it. It goes up in a single night from 300 to 500 and even 1,000 per cent. Nothing has ever been known equal to it in regard to the increase of the value of real estate.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri, then, that in the bill there ought to be a provision for condemnation. It is not safe to proceed in this matter without such a provision.

Mr. VEST. However that may be, we discussed the proposition also in regard to condemnation. That does not help the matter any, because the condemnation always involves the verdict of a jury in the District of Columbia, and while the citizens of the District of Columbia are as honest and unselfish as the average citizens of the country, yet, without any disrespect to them, I am compelled to say that the verdict of a jury where the United States is purchasing property is apt to be largely in excess of the value of the property.

We have attempted in every instance where it was possible to get ground already belonging to the Government. It was thought we could put this hall of records on land the title to which is already in the Government. Whether it can be done or not I do not positively know. There is a difference of opinion in regard to that. But about one thing I am certain, if the Senator from Iowa will give me his attention for a moment: it will never do to put this discretion within one head of Department—for instance, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury—alone. This hall of records is to be used by all the departments. It is for the legislative, the judicial, and the different Departments, including the Supreme Court of the United States.

It may not be known to Senators, but it is the fact that the upper portion of this building is to-day solid with old papers, and the Architect of the Capitol has informed the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that if a single spark of fire should go among those papers it would inevitably result, not probably in the destruction of the walls of the Capitol, but it would blow off the roof of it and incur an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Quartermaster-General's Department, the old building for which we pay $10,000 a year rent, opposite Willard's Hotel, on the corner of Fifteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, has been on fire twice and barely escaped a conflagration, which would have destroyed rolls and vouchers and certificates which would have involved Congress in an endless source of claims and the Government in any amount of litigation.

This hall of records building is absolutely necessary. It is eminently proper that the discretion both as to the site and as to the plans and specifications should be under the control of the heads of the three great Departments, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of State.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me a suggestion? It is not proposed to modify that part of the bill which gives the discretion as to the plans and specifications to these three officers.

Mr. VEST. I understand not.

Mr. HARRISON. If they have a discretion as to the plans and specifications, the application of the plans to a site is something certainly that ought to be confided to the same men.

Mr. VEST. I think so.

Mr. HARRISON. One man should not select a site and then three say what sort of a building shall go on it.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to this commission, but I was led to approve the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio from the fact that the bill limits the location of the site.

Mr. VEST. It says "near the War Department."

Mr. ALLISON. It says "for the purchase of a site near the War Department;" and I intended to suggest that when the bill was framed it had in view the ground which I named, namely, that on the southwest corner of New York avenue and Seventeenth street, and that was the ground originally selected by the Secretary of War, General Meigs, and those who had this building in view a few years ago.

Mr. VEST. This matter has been pending for a number of years. I have been on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for five years, and we have recommended two bills, both of which have passed the Senate, but the House did not pay any attention to the measure, and never took it from the Speaker's table. We have had all sorts of recommendations as to sites. The heads of Departments have differed about it. General Meigs recommended a site very different from the one suggested by the Senator from Iowa. After all it must be determined by somebody, and as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] said, it seems to me eminently appropriate that the last determination should be made by the heads of the three Departments which are particularly interested in the storage of these papers. At any rate this is the best the committee could do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12 it is proposed to strike out the word "said" and insert "the site for the building to be selected and purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State, and the;" so as to read:

The site for the building to be selected and purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State, and the building to be erected under the supervision and direction, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he strike out, in lines 5 and 6, the words "purchase of a site near the War Department and."

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that; I do not propose to limit it.

Mr. ALLISON. That would leave the discretion to these Cabinet officers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection that modification will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it in order to propose an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order, now that the bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I propose an amendment, to which I think there will be no objection, to come in at the close of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the entire expense incurred in the purchase of a site and the erection and completion of a building thereon shall not exceed the sum of $200,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. VEST. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It may occur that the site will cost a great deal more than is anticipated now. If these three Cabinet officers should select a certain locality in the city it may take $50,000 to purchase the ground alone. I do not know what plans or what specifiations will be adopted by the Supervising Architect under the control of these Cabinet officers, but I certainly think that in a matter of this sort, which affects the whole country—it is not a local question, it is not a building in a certain town or city, it is in the capital of the United States—we ought not to limit the amount to $200,000, especially when we have not fixed the amount for the site and do not know what it will cost. If it should turn out that any extravagant estimate is made I should be ready with the Senator to pursue the path of economy, but I do not think we ought to do it now. We ought to leave at least this discretion in the hands of these high officers, and we ought to indulge in the assumption that they will do the best they can economically and honestly for the public interest.

Mr. PLUMB. The suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is in substance that there shall be no limit at all, and therefore the sum named in the first line of the bill is entirely superfluous. We had that matter before the Senate in regard to the proposition to fit out an expedition to the North Pole, and the only defense there for opening the door wide and allowing the Secretary of the Navy to spend all the money that he desired without any limit was the fact that it was an emergency on which depended the lives of people, &c.

Now, does either the committee or the Senator know in substance what the building will cost? Do they know what kind of a building is to be erected? They do or they do not. If they do not, then why put in $200,000? Why not simply say that the board of officers shall erect just such a building as they may see fit? It is, I submit, a vicious principle of legislation.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, I understood that the $200,000 was put in because that was the estimate which was made by General Meigs and the Supervising Architect of the probable cost, provided a site could be obtained either upon lands already belonging to the Government or at a very reasonable sum. This of course is merely an approximate estimate. It is the best that we could do under the circumstances, because the whole thing is in futuro.

Mr. PLUMB. A very large building may be erected for $200,000; a very large building may be put up for $150,000; but if we open the door and permit the building to be built without any limit, we may expect, judging from the past, something fanciful in the way of architecture, something which will have as much reference or perhaps more to looks than it will to safety. So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to do that. I do not see any reason why we should not limit the cost of a building in the city of Washington as well as one in the city of Saint Louis. The fact that it is for the whole country, as the Senator says, does not relieve it from the charge of indefiniteness nor the whole plan from what I conceive to be a vicious principle. If it is to be for the whole country and therefore ought to be larger than it should be if intended for some specific portion of the country, then make the sum larger. I shall not object to $300,000 or to half a million dollars, if the Senator from Missouri will say that so much is necessary; but I do object to setting in motion machinery which permits the executive officers of this country to pledge the Government for any kind of a building or any degree of expenditure that they may see fit.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask what the figure proposed is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

Provided, That the entire expense incurred in the purchase of a site and the erection and completion of a building thereon shall not exceed the sum of $200,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know whether that is satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri or not, but I would rather know precisely what sort of a building would answer the uses and then I should be willing to put the limitation at the precise sum needed.

This is not a building of slight importance, as those know who have paid some attention to the subject. I do not know how much the land will cost under this bill. That is quite an uncertain item. The building is not expected to be one of ornament; of course it should be built decently, tastefully, respectably; it is to be a mere fire-proof warehouse, and yet that will cost something, because there is to be considered the making it fire-proof in its exterior walls and in all parts of it—absolutely fire-proof. There is also to be considered the serious question of ventilation, such a construction of the building that there shall not be an accumulation of moisture within the building to the utter ruin of the documents to be stored there. It will ultimately be absolutely packed with the accumulated records of the Government. I hope there are gentlemen here who will see the time when you will need another building and a larger expenditure of money if you hope to relieve the present offices from their surplus papers.

I do not like to limit the bill by anything except the necessities of a perfectly satisfactory building, abundant for the purpose for the next ten or fifteen years.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, a building was designed for this purpose by General Meigs. He estimated that he could build a structure two hundred feet square for $150,000, and the ground which I have mentioned was at that time to be purchased for $50,000 or in that neighborhood. If the ground only costs $50,000, I have no doubt a suitable fire-proof building may be erected there for about $150,000; but when that estimate was made the cost of materials was much less than it is now. Therefore it seems to me that a suitable building can hardly be put up for $150,000, allowing only $50,000 for the site. So I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he limit the cost of this building, including the purchase of a site, to $250,000, and I have no doubt it can be done for that sum.

Mr. VEST. I do not know that I should object to that provision. As the Senator from Iowa has stated, General Meigs, when he was retired from the Army—he had taken great interest in this matter while he was in office—estimated that the building could be erected for $150,000; and as a matter of courtesy, and because we had confidence in him, the provision in the bill which passed at the last session was inserted that this building should be under his supervision. He prepared a plan. That plan was taken at this session to the present Quartermaster-General, and great objection was made to it. He had entirely different views in regard to the way in which the building should be constructed, and therefore the provision was put in the bill as it stands to-day, that the plans and specifications should be under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of State. What those plans and specifications will be depends upon the Supervising Architect. What the ground will cost depends upon the site.

I have not consulted with other members of the committee, but for myself I should have no objection to limiting the amount to, say, not to exceed $250,000. I do not know but that $300,000 would be better; but I will accept $250,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend it by striking out "$200,000" and inserting "$250,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I submit to the Senator from Missouri that an amendment in the third line is necessary by inserting "$250,000" instead of "$200,000."

Mr. VEST. That is right.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to amend, in the third line, by inserting after the word "hundred" the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

That the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 573) amending an act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, approved June 5, 1882, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who reported the bill is absent. That bill was reported adversely and I suppose it should be indefinitely postponed, and another bill, the next bill on the Calendar, was reported favorably in its stead.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move that Senate bill No. 573 be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. The proper motion I think would be to take up Senate bill 247 and consider that, and then if any Senator desires the other bill in lieu of it it can be offered as a substitute. The Senator from Illinois reported one bill adversely and then reported another with amendments on the same subject. He reported the bill substantially that was introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on this subject. By just passing over this bill for the present and taking up the next the whole matter can be accommodated.

Mr. FRYE. If this bill is indefinitely postponed it gets it out of the way, and it is entirely in order to offer the whole or any part of it as an amendment to the next bill. The true way is to indefinitely postpone it.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection. I make no point about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to indefinitely postpone this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill (S. 247) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRYE. That is a bill which I introduced and had referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and for certain reasons I would rather it should not be considered to-day. Therefore I ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill be informally passed over, holding its place at the head of the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LAPHAM. As to Senate bill 573 I was not attending at the time and I did not hear the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin until it was acted on. I desire to have that question reserved to be considered with the other bill. They are analogous questions, and I want to be heard in support of the proposition of bill 573 which affects in a single particular the mode of distribution of the money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed?

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask unanimous consent that it be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which Senate bill 573 was indefinitely postponed? The Chair hears no objection, and it is reconsidered.

Mr. LAPHAM. Now I ask to have it stand with Senate bill 247.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York that this bill stand to be considered with the bill mentioned by him? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOURS OF LABOR.

The bill (S. 141) to fix and regulate the hours of labor of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by the Government of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORRILL. This is altogether a bill of too wide a scope to be considered under the five-minute rule. Therefore I object to its consideration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. BLAIR. The result of which is that it takes its place at the end of those cases which are to be considered under Rule IX?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It holds its place on the Calendar to be considered when reached under the ninth rule.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

The bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORRILL. This is a bill of the same character as the preceding bill, and it certainly deserves a longer and more thorough consideration than we can give it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLAIR. I should hope this bill might be considered under the five-minute rule. The proposition is in substance, or very nearly at least, the same as the bureau of statistics of labor as established in the State of Massachusetts and in some other States. I should think that such attention as we might give to it under the five-minute rule of discussion would remove any objections, if there are any, to the bill. In fact, I had hoped it was one of those bills to which there would be very little objection any way. It is simply for the collection and dissemination of information in regard to the subject-matter of labor in the same way that we now have a bureau established for the collection and dissemination of information relating to the subject of education.

The amount of expense to be incurred is quite limited, not to exceed $15,000 a year, besides the slight expense that will be incurred in the way of the salary of the head of the bureau and the single clerk allowed him, or two at the most.

It is a bill in which a great many people of this country take a profound interest, and they think it is necessary to pass a measure of some kind on this subject. I do not think one that is any less objectionable than this is can well be devised. As there is a pretty general and widespread expectation of early action on this bill, particularly among the people of this country who work for a living, I should hope that we might act upon it at this time. We know how dangerous delays are. If this bill is put at the end of the Calendar under Rule IX, with the disposition that exists to make special orders and to take up bills out of their order, it is quite possible that this may fail to be acted upon at all at this session; and as one who has taken some interest in the subject of labor for some time, and more especially recently, knowing, as I think I do, that there is a profound feeling that agitates millions of the American people, a very large proportion of our voting population in both parties, I should hope that this bill, in which I know that they feel more interest than in any other relating to the subject of labor, would receive early and prompt action. I should hope it might now be acted on without its being sent to another place on the Calendar. If the Senator from Vermont insists on his objection, of course under the rule the bill must go over.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know that I have any objection to the substantial parts of the bill, but it seems to me that it is not necessary to establish another and independent bureau when perhaps this business might as well be connected with some other bureau; the Bureau of Education, perhaps, or the Bureau of Agriculture. I think we ought to have time to fully consider it. The bill as it stands involves the expense of another bureau, and perhaps another building to accommodate the clerks of this bureau.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must call the attention of both Senators to the fact that under Rule VIII no Senator is permitted to speak oftener than once on the same question nor more than five minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to considering the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg the Senator from Vermont to withdraw the objection that I may make a remark.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to say, Mr. President, that I am not one of those persons, if there be any such persons, who have undertaken over to use the question of the relation between labor and capital as a political instrument. I do not expect to make any bids for the votes of persons who belong to labor organizations or labor parties or who have special interests connected with the laboring classes distinguished from those of the rest of the community in their charge; but at the same time, entirely disclaiming any such purpose, I do believe that one of the most important questions with which legislation can deal in this country, wherever the power of legislation is placed, is that which relates to the effect of our financial, protective, and other policies upon the condition of our laborers and upon the maintenance of the American rate of wages. If the existing rate of wages paid to workingmen in this country can not be maintained, and increased if possible, I despair of the maintenance of the Republic for many generations. It is impossible to have a republic founded upon universal suffrage unless the great mass of the community can receive as the reward of their labor a sum sufficient to afford them education, leisure, comfort, and to develop a patriotic interest in the country to which they belong.

There is no one thing which the persons interested in this class of questions have united in requesting except that we shall afford them the means of throwing light upon the questions in which they are interested. This is not a question of an eight-hour law; it is not a question of checking the accumulation of great estates in single hands; it is not a question of curbing the power of large corporations; it is not a question of dividing the products of labor between labor and capital; it is a simple question of having information furnished by public methods and by public instrumentalities to legislators and to other persons interested specially in these public questions.

This measure when it has been reached hitherto has under one rule of the Senate or another or under one pretext or device or another gone over. It was not reached at all in the last Congress. In a previous Congress, when I was a member of the other House a measure substantially like this passed the House with but some twenty or thirty dissenting votes, after various propositions for delay had been overcome. Then it came up in the Senate, and under its rules was put aside and overthrown.

Now we have reached this bill in its order. I do not believe that any of the suggestions which my friend from Vermont makes or desires to make would fail to be made in five minutes, or if there were any case where a gentleman wished to speak two or three minutes more or to speak more than once, the Senate, as they always do, would accord the privilege. I wish to say for myself that if my friend from Vermont persists in his objection, which I trust he will not, I shall move that the Senate under the rule lay aside the pending business and take up the matter now for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend persists in his objection, I shall move to lay aside the pending business; or my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] can make the motion. Before I take my seat I move that the other business be laid aside and this bill taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of this bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. MORRILL. If other Senators have considered this bill so that they are satisfied to proceed with it now, I shall certainly not make any objection. It is the farthest thing possible from my wishes to interpose any objection to any proposition that would be for the benefit of a laboring man. I have been all my life and always expect to be nothing but a laboring man, and I have not a drop of blood in my veins that does not sympathize with the aspirations of the laboring men in efforts to better their condition——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is constrained very reluctantly to remind the Senator from Vermont that under Rule VIII no Senator is permitted to speak more than once on the same question.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire. I presume that nobody has any objection to a careful collation of the statistics relating to the labor of the country; and not only is there no objection to it, but I presume that every statistician and every politician and every economist would be very glad to get them. He refers to the collection of statistics with regard to education in the Interior Department. Now, he will remember that we have a Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department. This is my suggestion—it is not original with myself, but I have been thinking of it for some time, like a million of things we think of that we do not find time to carry out: the existing Bureau of Statistics should be enlarged and dignified and duly regulated in a well-considered act, and the collection of statistics of all descriptions should be brought under the charge of one very capable man, so that we might be able to go to one office and get whatever we desire concerning the statistics of commerce, navigation, finance, education, labor, and manufactures, to be collected by bright and capable chiefs of divisions under the head of one such man as might be capable to conduct the national census. Without extraordinary expense an office of that description might be maintained there which would be of inestimable value to all of us.

Now, we are likely to build up, scattered all about the city under the different Secretaries, bureaus of statistics, quadrupling the necessary expense and reducing the efficiency of the service. The only reason I should like to see this bill laid over even for a short time is that some person might prepare—it can be done easily by consultation with gentlemen familiar with statistics in the different branches—a bill covering all these subjects, classifying, condensing, and rendering effective the whole work.

Mr. PLUMB. I think some such bill as this ought to pass, or rather I think there ought to be some provision of law whereby the statistics called for in this bill can be had. I do not think it is necessary to enact a separate law for that purpose, because we can put on, in a few well-chosen words, to bureaus now existing the necessary authority to do this work. We have already two statistical bureaus, one in the Treasury Department and one in the Agricultural Department. They are both of them publishing matter from time to time.

Mr. HAWLEY. And one in the Interior Department.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, and one in the Interior Department also. For the purpose and in order that the bureau in the Treasury Department may justify itself, it is in the habit of running over to the Agricultural Bureau and borrowing statistics from that bureau and publishing them in advance of publication there. I only speak of that to emphasize the fact that we have bureaus enough equipped and organized to accomplish this purpose now. We have not got any bureau charged with the special matter which this bill seeks to charge somebody with, and that therefore is something which we might well do by law. But whether we ought to have a special bureau or not for that purpose is a matter which I think is open to doubt. We could add to the bureau already existing in the Agricultural Department, and which is well presided over and is doing an excellent work as I think, the necessary authority to do what this bill calls for; and then we ought to abolish the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, which is simply a poacher as it were on the functions of other bureaus to a large extent, and have one bureau which should perform all this duty.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to take anything from the Senator's time, but I would suggest to him that the action of these various statistical officers is under clearly well-defined jurisdictions, each of his own, and they interfere in no way with each other. The Bureau of Statistics to which the Senator refers confines itself exclusively to the subject-matter of commerce and matters appertaining specially to commerce and manufactures; almost exclusively to commerce.

The field of operation for an officer of the kind provided for in this bill is broad as the continent, and I assure him that the man who supposes that there is not as much as a citizen of the highest ability can possibly do with an able corps of assistants in this direction fails fully to comprehend the mass of matter and the importance of that matter with which he would have to deal. It is a much larger subject than I used to think it was; and if I were to do anything, I would make this bill broader in its scope, and all these other statisticians and all these other bureaus having to do with statistics should revolve around this as the grand center, for there is no field in which useful and reliable statistics can be obtained so important to the well-being of the American people as in this direction.

The Commissioner of Agriculture has already enough to do, and I am aware that there is a proposition to enlarge the scope of his duties. He will then have more than he can do. In this direction there can be well employed the most eminent talents of the Republic; and I do not think it will be satisfactory to anybody who understands this matter fully or who gives much thought to it that this measure shall be cut down——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] has expired, in whose time the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has been speaking.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think we should be careful not to pay too much attention and too much regard to the interests of capital and too little to those of labor. The laboring people of the country certainly regard it as true that there is an antagonism between capital and labor, whatever may be the fact in a true economic point of view in that respect. They have organized themselves in extensive associations throughout this country and throughout Europe. They have demanded of Congress that some regard be paid to their wishes in this respect. They ask for statistics of labor, for a bureau to gather statistics of labor as distinguished from the other great interests of the country. I can see no reason why that wish, expressed by their representative bodies with great unanimity for several years, should not be gratified, nor can I see any reason in a true political economy why labor, which is the foundation of all wealth and all prosperity, should not have special regard paid to it.

Why, sir, in the State of Massachusetts they have a most admirable system of statistics of labor, which furnishes most valuable and necessary information upon all economic questions. The same system should be extended throughout the whole of this country. A bureau devoted to that purpose will not be more than able to accomplish it, for it is a great work and the most important work of the modern economic system. The interests and the rights of labor is the great problem on the proper and wise adjustment of which the future of our own and all other industrial countries depends.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the report be read.

Mr. BLAIR. The report is merely a formal one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR on February 4, 1884:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor, have considered the same, and report the same back to the Senate favorably, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It seems to me that Senators who have spoken in respect to this matter are in accord on the general proposition that there should be an officer to collate these statistics. The only difference of opinion seems to be as to whether the work should be done by a separate bureau or be attached to some existing bureau. I was particularly pleased by the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts in respect to the necessity and propriety of establishing a bureau of this sort with a view of ascertaining the best methods of keeping up the wages of the American laborers and enhancing those wages, if possible, for the better protection of our institutions. I am glad to see that the Senator from Massachusetts has come to this conclusion. I think that it is well enough to establish this bureau in accordance with the provisions of this bill. We ought to do something. It has been delayed too long, and if you pass it over now and refuse to pass this bill, in the hope or belief that this same thing should be done in another form by attaching it to another bureau or to some Department other than the Interior Department, probably nothing will be done at this session of Congress. If we establish it now in this form under the control of the officer provided for in this bill, we can consolidate this bureau with some other bureau afterward, if it be found expedient and appropriate to do so. I think that this bureau might be established as an adjunct to the Department of Agriculture; perhaps that would be the best place for it, so as to be under the supervision of the Commissioner of Agriculture, who ought to be a Cabinet officer. Now the Agricultural Bureau has developed into a department, and I am in favor of attaching this bureau to the Department of Agriculture. Certainly I am in favor of the objects of this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. This bill I think has the unanimous approval of the Committeee on Education and Labor, and it is certainly important that it should be passed at once. I concur fully with what the Senator from Connecticut has said in regard to the importance of having a general bureau of statistics, and I hope this may be the first step in that direction. It should be a general bureau of statistics under the Interior Department, which should have charge of the collection of all statistics, and when the time arrives have the charge of taking the census. But there is one provision in this bill which does not meet with my approval, and that is the amount fixed for the salary of chief of this bureau, who should be a man of first-class capacity and ability, and no such man can be obtained for the sum of $2,500. I therefore move that "two thousand five hundred," in the sixth line, be stricken out and the words "four thousand" substituted in place thereof. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept the amendment. We certainly can not secure a man of the right kind for the sum named in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment a little larger in its scope than that offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. It would be in the nature of an amendment to chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the Bureau of Statistics. I will move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, down to section 3, and insert in section 3:

That in addition to the duties now confided by law to the Bureau of Statistics there shall be, &c.

Chapter 10 provides for a bureau of statistics. The first section, section 334 of the Revised Statutes, provides:

There shall be in the Department of the Treasury a bureau to be called the Bureau of Statistics, and the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint one division clerk, who shall superintend the bureau, and shall be entitled to a salary of $2,500 a year.

It goes on to prescribe specifically what he shall do. This is limited to statistics more particularly in reference to commercial transactions. There is one difficulty in many of our laws at this time, that we scatter, if I may use the expression, the work of different Departments, so that they are first in one place and then in another. I think it is better to put this work under the present Bureau of Statistics, and in increasing that work we may increase the salary beyond that of the clerk designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I fully agree with all that has been said by the Senator from Florida, the Senator from New Hampshire, and others in reference to the importance of this subject. I think it is one of the very first importance. I think this information is valuable in many respects and for many purposes, and I would not for one throw any obstacle in the way of securing it, completing it, and perfecting it in the most ample form possible; but I think, as we have now one Bureau of Statistics verging somewhat on this, we might as well put the whole work under one head and have, if you please, one report to contain all this information.

The other day I reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill providing for collecting statistics in reference to marriage and divorce, in answer to a great many petitions sent here, and, I believe, among others, one presented by the Senator from New Hampshire himself. We put that matter by that bill under the Bureau of Statistics, and I think now that we should have one bureau for the collection of statistics of whatever character we need, so that we shall not divide up this work and throw part of it in the Interior Department and part in the Treasury Department. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, who has charge of the bill, to this particular idea. With a little enlargement of the scope of the present law under chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes I think we can accomplish all the Senator desires, and if the friends of this measure—and I am one of the friends of it, but wish to put the matter under the particular bureau now in existence——

Mr. BLAIR. I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is now in order, but the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to perfect the text will first be acted upon.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is first in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I would say in regard to that amendment that the only sentiment which has come to myself, and so far as I know to any member of the committee, in regard to the provisions of this bill from the laboring people of the country has been one of unqualified approval of the bill just as it is, excepting that they have demanded that a salary be paid to the commissioner who is to have charge of the collection of these statistics commensurate with their conception of the importance of the functions he is to discharge; and they have said that no $2,500 would be such an amount for his services. I agree quite fully with them, and so far as I am concerned I would favor the amendment, and I think the committee would do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. At the suggestion of several Senators about me, I modify my amendment to read "$3,500" instead of "$4,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, in section 2, line 6, to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,500."

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the first bill on the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the existing order be laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill which has been under discussion. I think we can dispose of it in a very short time.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has specially requested to address the Senate at 2 o'clock to-day. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire to let this bill be passed over.

Mr. BLAIR. Then this will be the unfinished business for the morning hour on Monday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This stands at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII for the next legislative day.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I should like to make an inquiry. Has the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas been offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is in the nature of a substitute and has been suggested, but has not yet been submitted to the Senate formally. The question upon that bill is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. BLAIR. How long does the Senator from Oregon want?

Mr. DOLPH. I think less than an hour.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to place this bill in such a position that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon we can go on with it.

Mr. MORRILL. It can be taken up and laid aside informally.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask, then, that it be taken up at this time and will then request that it be laid aside informally until the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BECK. Does that require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the form the Senator from New Hampshire puts it, it will require unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to delay business; but if we are going into a general revision of salaries, I should like to have the bill take its place for to-morrow morning or whenever we meet again, because this change involves of course a change of everybody who is doing the same kind of work up to the same rate, and there are many other things that might be considered in this connection to-morrow morning. There is no hurry about it.

Mr. BLAIR. As there seems to be some opposition to going on with the bill to-day, I will allow it to come up regularly at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. That is better.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the naval appropriation bill for reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Chair laying before the Senate at this time a House bill for reference? The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William H. Young be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, in pursuance of previous notice, I now ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 701) making appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, for the purpose of submitting some remarks in relation to the bill and at the conclusion of my remarks moving its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent of the Senate to take up for consideration at this time the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I did not ask for a reference of this bill at the time it was introduced, for the reason that I desired an opportunity of making some suggestions concerning it which I hoped would have some weight in securing the liberal action of Congress, not only with reference to the appropriation asked for by it, but with reference to the appropriations asked for for the prosecution of the works for the improvement of the rivers and harbors upon the north Pacific coast now being carried on by the United States Government, and for which the Chief of Engineers has recommended appropriations.

Since the introduction of this bill the Senate, with a generous recognition of the importance of the extended seacoast, great rivers, and growing commerce of the Pacific Northwest, has placed both my colleague and myself upon the Committee on Commerce, where we will have an opportunity of presenting for the consideration of the committee the commercial necessities of that region. I am not certain but that it may be considered a poor return for such generosity upon the part of this body for me to still adhere, even in part, to my original purpose, and to ask, as I do, the indulgence of the Senate to present some facts and make some statements in relation to the region known as the Pacific Northwest, the original Oregon, now the State of Oregon, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, which in my judgment entitle it to favorable consideration from Congress.

It was once necessary for that country to supplicate Congress for recognition, to plead for a hearing as to its value, resources, and possibilities, and to be permitted to show that it was worth saving to the United States; and if it had not been for the pioneers of Oregon, who so persistently pressed upon the people and the Government the importance of that country, with an intelligence, earnestness, and patriotism worthy of all honor, it seems probable that that magnificent region would have been lost to the United States.

I believe no other portion of our country to-day possesses advantages of climate, soil, and resources equal to those of the Pacific Northwest. It has not been long since a truthful statement of its advantages from any source was generally received by the people of the Eastern States as greatly exaggerated, if not positively untruthful; but happily such is no longer the case. I do not deem it necessary in presenting the claims of that region to enter at length or with particularity into a description of the country or its resources. I, however, find some things concerning the Oregon of to-day so well and fairly stated in the valuable history of Oregon by Barrows, recently published, that I quote from that work in preference to presenting my own statements. He says:

It remains to give in summary the condition of the country whose concession to the United States has now been outlined. Properly and comprehensibly this country was Oregon and Washington and Idaho Territories. The three civil sections constitute a vast block in the American domain, with British Columbia on the north, Montana and Dakota on the east, Utah, Nevada, and California on the south and the Pacific on the west. The area is 251,562 square miles, more than double that of Great Britain and Ireland, and thirty-two times the size of Massachusetts, whose citizen founded our claim to it in the discovery of its great river.

* * * * * * *

This region, the original Oregon of the treaty of 1846, is larger than three New Englands by the excess of six States like Massachusetts, and in most respects for human homes and national wealth it is naturally superior to New England. In climate, soil, and mineral, both precious and practical, it leads promptly. In cereals, meats, fish, and vegetables it is also naturally the leader of New England, as its products and exports are steadily showing.

* * * * * * *

Had the same energy worked for two centuries on our Northwest that has been expended on our Northeast, the contrast between the two sections would now be extremely marked in favor of the former. Immigration and years only are wanting to show how highly nature has favored the country in question. * * * The surprising climate of this section will show that no natural products can be denied it that may be elsewhere found in the United States farther north than the northern latitude of Virginia. For the line of average heat or cold which passes through Northern Virginia runs northerly and westerly by Pittsburgh, forty miles south of Lake Erie and sixty south of Chicago, a little north of Rock Island into Iowa, through Southwestern Minnesota into Dakota, thence northwest through the upper and eastern corner of Montana, and about sixty miles over the line into British territory, thence by a great curve cutting Northwestern Montana and the extreme north of Idaho, and continuing midway and northerly, it passes through Washington Territory into British Columbia, and leaves the continent about two hundred miles north of the northern boundary of the United States. Along this line the mean or average annual temperature is 50°, and sections cut by it have the average heat and cold of Northern Virginia. It passes through the great wheat belt of North America. Other things being equal, therefore, the grains and fruits and vegetables which may be raised on this line in Virginia or Ohio or Illinois or Iowa may be raised in Dakota and Montana and Washington.

As to Oregon, it is left wholly on the south of this line. Says Hugh Small, in his Oregon and Her Resources, "There is scarcely a grain, fruit, vegetable, grass, tree, plant, or flower that grows in the United States or in Europe but some portions of the soil of Oregon will raise to perfection, with fair cultivation."

* * * * * * *

This fact as to the line of average temperature will prepare the way for other facts that otherwise might seem incredible. As a rule in both Oregon and Washington stock does well through the year in the open air, foraging on the abundant natural pasturage. The bunch-grass matures in July, and is hayed uncut. Horses and sheep may be trusted to it for good wintering, while it is good policy to provide some hay and shelter for horned cattle. The snow is light, and in some of the counties in Oregon it has not covered the ground for three consecutive days for a score of years. * * * The causes of this warm temperature four and five hundred miles farther north than New York are two: About 70 per cent. of the winds on that coast are from the southwest, and carry the heat from the tropics far inland even to Dakota. Then the "black stream"—Kuro-siwo—starting off Southeastern Asia, passes up the Asiatic coast, and, dividing on the Aleutian Archipelago, the eastern half is forced down the Alaskan and Northwest coast, carrying a large body of torrid water, which makes its warmth felt far into the interior. This warming force may be estimated somewhat by the fact that when fully formed off the coast of China and Japan this stream is four hundred miles wide, with a flow of four miles an hour in sections of it.

* * * * * * *

The agricultural products of Oregon have been named, but special mention should be made of its wheat crop. This is the leading staple, and is noted for its unusual weight, being often from five to nine pounds in excess of the standard weight of sixty pounds to the bushel. Small gives the average for fair farming in the Willamette valley at thirty bushels to the acre, which is double the average for the United States. The harvest of 1881 gave a surplus for the general market of 10,000,000 of bushels, or 300,000 tons. Of this, the region east of the Cascades produced 120,000 tons, and western Oregon and Washington the rest. The grains following wheat in quantity of product are oats, barley, corn, rye, and buckwheat, and in very satisfactory yield. The total product of the six has risen from about 2,000,000 of bushels in 1860 to some 13,000,000 in 1880.

The amount of arable land will for a long time be a question of local option with the farmer of energy and thrift. Vast valleys stand assigned of nature to the plow, as truly as the unlimited wheat-fields of Minnesota and Dakota. Leading among these is the Willamette, with its 5,000,000 of acres; then the Umpqua, one-half as large; the Rogue River Valley, a little smaller; the Umatilla; the Grand Ronde, about 275,000 acres; the Walla Walla, Klamath, John Day, Powder, Jordan, Palouse, Yakima, Spokan, and others. * * * Peaches, pears, apples, plums, cherries, grapes, and, indeed, generally, the fruits of the temperate zone, flourish in the lower lands. The smaller fruits of the garden are abundant and ready for the table early in May. * * *

As a timber and lumber country, with facilities for transportation, probably the region is not surpassed. The merchant marine of the world could be built and annually renewed there without heavy drafts on the natural supply. The timber distant from water transportation will wait as a proper reserve for the branch railroads. The majesty and beauty of these primitive forests can hardly be exaggerated, where the yellow fir stands 250 feet, the pine, silver fir, and black spruce 150, and the white oak 70. Cedars have been found there 20 feet in diameter. Nor does the demand allow these grand forests to stand uninvaded. A single mill has the capacity to cut out 200,000 feet of lumber a day, and in 1882 the aggregate cutting capacity of all the mills was 1,000,000 a day.

I will only add to this description that by reason of the mild winters this region is undoubtedly the best country for cattle in the United States. Horses of an excellent type are largely raised. Sheep-husbandry is one of the greatest and most productive industries, and the wool grown in this section is particularly noted for its uniform fiber.

The waters of Oregon and Washington abound with fish, and the business of salmon-packing is one of the principal industries. The mineral interests of this region are large and diversified. Not only are the precious metals successfully mined, but the useful metals, coal, iron, copper, &c., exist in abundance in many parts of the country.

It is impossible at this time to justly estimate the results which will accrue to this hitherto comparatively isolated region by the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is less than eighty years since Lewis and Clarke conducted their memorable expedition across the continent, when, from an undefined line known as the frontier far east of the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, the vast wilderness scarcely trodden by the foot of civilized man was peopled and held in undisputed possession by the original inhabitants of this continent. That vast region has since become the home of civilization. Out of it have been carved States and Territories. The wave of immigration has swept across the continent, the Pacific Northwest is the last territory to be thus occupied, and the Pacific Ocean will for the present mark the limits of the westward movement. Notwithstanding the difficulties of reaching that region, its great advantages, although but imperfectly known, have hitherto attracted a large immigration, and there is no room for doubt but that over the new line of travel but recently opened will throng to Oregon, Washington, and Idaho in the near future a great multitude of intelligent and enterprising people. By means of its trunk-line nearly 2,000 miles in length, traversing a belt of fertile country, and half as many miles more of branches penetrating rich mineral and agricultural regions, the Northern Pacific Railroad has brought an empire vast in extent and almost unlimited in resources into contact with the commercial world, opened it up to settlement and development, and furnished the means of transportation whereby the products of the soil, the mines, and the forests will find an outlet to market. Over the road as fast as it has been opened for travel an eager, enterprising, and intelligent people have poured into the regions made accessible by it, to occupy and subdue, until the continent has been girdled with a line of civilization.

There has been a very large increase of the population of this region within the last three years. The population of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho Territories, according to the official returns of the census of 1880, was as follows: Oregon, 174,767; Washington Territory, 75,120; Idaho, 32,610.

The present population is estimated to be, at least, as follows: Oregon, 275,000; Washington Territory, 150,000; Idaho, 75,000.

The total value of Columbia River exports for the year 1883, as appears from the following table clipped from the New Year's issue of the Portland Oregonian, was as follows:

These tables show a falling off of the value of wheat and flour exported during 1883 of nearly $4,000,000 from the value of the export for the year ending July 31, 1882. This is in part owing to the increased demand for home consumption, caused by the unprecedented immigration into the country and large railroad operations in the interior, and probably in part to the condition of the market, which has caused a large portion of the crop of 1883 to be held for better prices.

The following statement shows the flags and tonnage of the grain fleet for the year 1883:

Flag.	Number of vessels.	Tonnage.
British	66	63,315
American	12	16,695
Swedish	1	730
German	2	1,868

For the year ending May 31, 1883, the amount of revenue collected from imports received by the Columbia River was—Portland, $327,756; Astoria, $112,216; total, $439,972.07.

Value of foreign imports for the year ending July 31, 1883, as I learn from a table compiled by the Board of Trade of Portland, was $913,521; value of domestic imports for same period, $27,290,526; total value of domestic and foreign, $28,203,746.

The number of arrivals and clearances for the same period was:

Coastwise: Arrivals, 506; tonnage, 773,144. Clearances, 423; tonnage, 691,453.

Foreign: Arrivals, 85; tonnage, 102,431. Clearances, 163; tonnage, 173,252.

The salmon fisheries of the lower Columbia River have become an important industry. The product has increased from 4,000 cases in 1864 to 629,000 cases in 1873, and the value of the shipment last year was (641,307 cases, at $4.80) $3,078,263.

The wholesale trade of the city of Portland for the year 1883 was $53,050,000.

The number of hands employed during the year in manufactures was 5,481; value of merchandise manufactured, $11,423,000; an increase over the year 1882 of the persons employed in manufactures of 1,303, and in the value of the manufactured articles of $3,689,000. The list of manufacturing industries numbers 54.

The trade of Idaho and of Western Montana naturally belongs to the North Pacific coast, and the merchants of Portland, as I am informed, are already competing with Eastern shippers for the trade of the region west of Bozeman, on the Northern Pacific. With the present facilities, and the additional facilities already being provided, for reaching the region tributary to the Columbia River it will be rapidly filled with settlers and its resources as rapidly developed. The constantly increasing surplus of agricultural and other products of this region will mainly find an outlet to market by the mouth of the Columbia River, and a considerable portion of the correspondingly increased imports of foreign and domestic merchandise required by such increased population will be brought into this country by the same channel.

I have spoken of the great extent of territory tributary to the Columbia River, of its unlimited resources, and of its great and rapidly increasing internal commerce. But there are other considerations which greatly magnify the importance of the lower Columbia River as a channel of commerce. I refer to the prospective increase of the coasting and foreign trade of the Pacific coast, of which the ports upon the Columbia River will receive a liberal share. I can only glance at this subject, and from the mass of historical facts and commercial statistics which present themselves and might be used to show the importance and magnitude which this trade is likely to attain in the near future, I am admonished that I must cull sparingly.

From the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on commerce and navigation for 1883 I learn that the value of exports of merchandise, coin, and bullion from the port of San Francisco for the year 1883 was $48,836,769, and the value of imports of merchandise, coin, and bullion at San Francisco for the same year was $54,953,778.

These figures will be better comprehended by comparing them with the commerce of the United States from 1820 to 1830. The following table shows the value of exports and imports from and to the United States for the decade ending September 30, 1830:

Value of merchandise exported during the decade ending September 30, 1830		$532,212,385
Annual average	$53,221,239
Coin and bullion exported during the same period		1,497,857
Annual average	$149,786
Estimated average of the population for the period	11,257,076
Total		533,710,242
Value of merchandise imported during the decade ending September 30, 1830		$567,491,739
Annual average	$56,749,174
Coin and bullion imported during the same period		3,892,533
Annual average	389,253
Total		571,384,272

The value of the commerce of a single port upon the Pacific coast for the year 1883 was very nearly as large as the average value of the entire commerce of the United States during the decade preceding the 30th day of September, 1830.

The following table shows the value of imports by sea of merchandise at San Francisco for the years 1882 and 1883 from countries lying upon the Pacific coast, in Asia, and from the islands of the Pacific, as well as the imports by sea and rail from all other countries combined:

The most significant fact in connection with the exports from San Francisco is that among the articles exported to China were 316,118 barrels of flour, of the value of $1,522,997.69.

I have given the value of the exports and imports from and to Portland and Astoria by the Columbia River for the year 1883. I have no means at hand of showing the countries from which the imports at the Columbia River ports were received or to what countries the exports from those ports were sent, but the figures given concerning the imports and exports at San Francisco will sufficiently indicate what the future commercial relations of the Pacific coast are to be. Some idea of the probable increase of the commerce on the Pacific coast in the future may be obtained from the following table, which shows the value of merchandise imported into and exported from the United States during each of the years 1873 and 1883 and the increase during that period:

Year.	Total exports.	Total imports.
1873	$522,479,922	$642,136,210
1883	823,839,402	723,180,914
Excess of	301,359,480	80,944,704

The growth of foreign commerce upon the Pacific coast for many years to come will be much larger proportionately than the growth of the whole commerce of the United States, and it is not improbable that within a single decade the foreign commerce of the Pacific coast will be equal to one-third of the present commerce of the United States, and that a quarter of a century hence the commerce of the Pacific coast will equal in amount and value the entire commerce of the United States in 1873.

The Pacific coast at present is at a disadvantage in marketing its wheat in Europe, as it is compelled to ship it around the Horn, but it is nearer by the breadth of a continent to the markets of the old East than are the Atlantic ports; and the time is not far distant when it will find a market for its wheat and flour in Asia and the islands of the Pacific. There is a large and constantly increasing shipment of flour from the Pacific coast to China, and well-informed persons assert that this trade will steadily increase until China alone will furnish a market for a large portion of the surplus wheat raised upon the coast.

Various causes have conspired to direct the commerce of the Pacific coast with China, Japan, and the Sandwich Islands to San Francisco. Chief among these causes have been the transcontinental railroad line terminating at that port, the steamship line between that place and the ports of China, and the monopoly of the sugar trade with the Sandwich Islands by her merchants. Since the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, opening a channel of commerce across the continent from ship navigation upon the Columbia River and Puget Sound with the great commercial centers of the East, Portland, Astoria, and the Puget Sound ports will become competitors with San Francisco for this trade. The number of sailing vessels engaged in this trade will no doubt be largely increased, and the necessities of commerce will demand better facilities for the future. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company will be compelled by the necessities of its business to place or aid in placing a line of steamships in the Asiatic trade to connect with its road.

The trade of San Francisco will not decrease, but the trade of Puget Sound and the Columbia River will largely increase. The advantages are decidedly in favor of the latter ports in competing for this trade. The distance between Canton and Port Townsend, the port of entry for the Puget Sound collection district, and between Canton and the Columbia River, is several hundred miles less than the distance between Canton and San Francisco. And the route from Canton to the Columbia and to the Straits of Juan de Fuca is in the direction of the trade-winds. It has been averred that the Pacific coast is greatly interested in the proposed interoceanic canal; and it is true that any work which will shorten the distance and lessen the cost of transportation between the Pacific coast and the markets of Europe will be of great advantage to the coast; but the Pacific coast is far from being dependent upon such a canal for its commercial prosperity.

The commercial outlook of the Pacific is westward. Every year its commercial relations with Europe will grow comparatively less important and its commercial relations with its transpacific neighbors will become greater. The continent of Asia and the islands of the Pacific, with their millions of inhabitants, with their rich and valuable commerce, are separated from us only by the open sea, over which steamships come and go with regularity and safety. It seems probable that everything imported into the United States from those countries consumed west of the Rocky Mountains and everything which will bear railroad transportation across the continent will be imported through the ports of the Pacific coast.

The coasting trade of the Columbia River ports is already large and it is rapidly increasing. Steamers run regularly between Portland and Astoria and the ports of Puget Sound and Alaska and between Portland and San Francisco, and although during the last summer a steamer was dispatched regularly every three days from Portland and San Francisco, they were unable to carry the freight and passengers offering, and special steamers had to be brought into requisition. Smaller steamers run between Portland and the various ports upon the coast of Oregon and Washington. One rapidly increasing branch of this trade deserves especial mention.

Alaska, with its great extent of seacoast, its great rivers, and immense resources, will largely add to the commerce of the Columbia River. In the last annual address of the president of the Board of Trade of Portland he said of this trade:

> The development of Alaska during the past year has continued. Portland controls nearly the entire trade of the southern portion of that Territory, and during the year its value has grown 40 per cent.

This trade will rapidly increase when a civil government shall have been provided for the Territory so as to give security to personal and property rights there. During the debate in the Senate upon the bill to provide a civil government for Alaska the senior Senator from Kansas took occasion to say of Alaska in substance, that he regarded Alaska as the most worthless territorial acquisition with which any government was ever afflicted, and that he was yet without information as to what compensation the United States had received for the $7,500,000 paid for it, other than the gratification of the American idea of "manifest destiny," which indicated that our northern shore was to be washed by the Polar Sea and that our southern boundary would be the interoceanic canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific; that it was separated from us by a dangerous and stormy sea, over which a voyage of many days must be taken to reach its nearest port, and that its gloomy and inhospitable shores were secluded by the conditions of its climate for many months from approach.

I intended before the discussion upon that bill was closed to have corrected what I considered to be misrepresentations concerning that Territory, but I was suddenly called away, and was unable to do so. I regret that the Senator is not alone in his estimate of Alaska. There is a widespread misapprehension concerning it, but it is no greater than that which existed in regard to the original Territory of Oregon and to the Louisiana purchase. As late as 1828 it was contended in Congress that even if the title of the United States to Oregon was undisputed the occupation of the Territory would be of doubtful utility from its barrenness, dangerous coasts, distance, and inaccessibility from the States by either land or sea.

A bill reported by a committee of the House to authorize the President to take possession of Oregon and to extend the laws of the United States over it was defeated by such arguments, and the question as to whether Oregon was worth saving was not finally decided by Congress until many years afterward. The criticisms upon the purchase of Alaska are nothing in comparison to those made upon the purchase of Louisiana. That purchase made by Thomas Jefferson "was assailed in every form of squib, epigram, doggerel, parable, and parody." The leading newspapers of the country denounced the purchase in unmeasured terms, and rivaled each other in ridiculing it in prose and verse.

It was said that the Louisiana tract was a "malarial swamp; its prairies were destitute of trees or vegetation; that we had been cheated by giving $15,000,000 for a territory so worthless and pestilential that it could never be inhabited or put to any possible use; the purchase would lead to complications and wars with foreign powers," &c. The following from the Commercial Advertiser of December, 1803, is a specimen of the epigrams afloat at the time:

> Herostratus of old, to eternize his name,
> Set the Temple of Diana all in a flame;
> But Jefferson, lately, of Bonaparte bought,
> To pickle his fame, a mountain of salt.

The last line is an allusion to a report upon the value of the purchase, which enumerated among other resources its saline springs. The reputation of Jefferson has not suffered on account of the Louisiana purchase; and notwithstanding the unfavorable criticism of the Senator from Kansas, I venture the prediction that the time will come when not even the great speeches of Mr. Seward upon the "impending crisis," or his eminent services to the Government during the civil war, will contribute more to his enduring fame than his successful negotiation of the purchase of Alaska.

The Territory of Alaska has a geographical area of 580,000 square miles. It is as large as twenty Eastern States. It is said to have a coast line greater than all the other coast line of the United States. The Yukon River in Alaska, which is seventy miles wide at its mouth and twenty miles wide at points 1,000 miles from its mouth and is navigable for 1,200 miles for steam vessels, is the largest river upon this continent. Alaska has a population, mostly Indians, of from 30,000 to 35,000; and while the Treasury of the United States is constantly drawn upon to feed and clothe the Indians upon reservations, the resources of Alaska are so great that these Indians have never been, and need never be, a public charge.

The fur trade is its present chief industry and is of great value. The United States derives a revenue from rent received for the privilege of taking the fur seal upon the Pribylov Group or Seal Islands alone of $317,500, which is a sum sufficient to pay interest upon the purchase price of Alaska at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum and over.

A far more important industry of Alaska, not so much on account of its present proportions as on account of its undoubted future development, is its fishing interests. Along its extended seacoast and in its numerous bays and rivers the time is not distant when a more extensive and profitable fishing business will be carried on than is to-day carried on along the north Atlantic coast. The value of such an industry not only to the Pacific coast but to the entire Union is apparent. When it is remembered that out of the lower Columbia River during last year were taken, packed, and exported over three millions of dollars in value of salmon some conception may be had of the great value of the fishing business which must develop upon the Alaskan coast, the number of vessels and men which will be given employment by it, and the great wealth which will be derived from it. This great industry will have its incidental advantages also. It will be a school in which American seamen will be trained; an industry from which American shipping will receive a new impetus.

The timber trade of Alaska must eventually, and as soon as title can be procured to timber land, become valuable. The Alaska cedar is a very valuable wood for many purposes and will command a high price in the market. It makes beautiful furniture and good finishing lumber. It has recently been substituted for box-wood for wood engraving. It is said to be proof against the teredo, and therefore very valuable for piling in salt water. It is reported on apparently good authority that for richness in the precious metals Alaska will yet rival the State of Nevada.

Last, but not least, Alaska is not the barren and inhospitable country it has been supposed to be. The climate is tempered by the warm ocean current already mentioned, which flows along the coast of China and Japan, bearing northeastward past the peninsula of Kamtschatka, in the direction of Behring Strait, so that the winters at Sitka, as to severity, do not differ very greatly from winters at New York city. I apprehend the want of adaptability of Southern Alaska for agricultural pursuits is not on account of the length or severity of its winters, but on account of its cool, wet summers.

Whether Alaska will ever become an agricultural country of importance at present admits of serious doubt. Although its agricultural resources are limited, its great resources and capacity for supporting a large prosperous population are undoubted. I find the following statement credited to Hon. Thomas Meehan, of Philadelphia, state botanist of Pennsylvania and editor of the Gardener's Monthly, and whose opinion is entitled to great weight. He says:

> Precisely the same conditions exist in Alaska as in England. I found a country far superior in many respects to Switzerland, and with a climate and elements of greatness at least equal to those which have given Great Britain all her industrial and commercial prosperity.

Steamships make regular trips the year round between Portland, in Oregon, and Sitka and Wrangel, in Alaska, carrying passengers and freight; and commodious steamships are dispatched from San Francisco monthly, or oftener during the summer months, via Portland, Puget Sound, and Victoria, for the points of interest in Alaska, carrying large numbers of excursionists. Instead of navigating "stormy and dangerous seas" to reach the Alaskan coast, after leaving Victoria the route is mainly through a perpetual archipelago, an inland channel, where the sea is never rough, and where it is ordinarily as placid as the water of a river.

Not only does Alaska greatly extend and promise to indefinitely increase the coasting trade of the Pacific coast, but it also extends the base of commerce with China and Japan.

The Columbia River takes its rise in the Rocky Mountains, in latitude 50° and 20′ north, flows northwardly as high as 52° 10′, makes the détour of the great bend into British Columbia; thence sweeps southward, receiving the waters of many tributaries, and forces its way westward through the Cascade Mountains on its course to the sea. Unlike the Mississippi, it seeks the ocean upon a line parallel with trade channels; it carries much less sediment; its banks are stable, and it may be safely improved without increasing the danger from the overflowing of its banks. It drains a basin 395,000 square miles in extent. It is navigable seven hundred and fifty miles from its mouth, with the interruptions of the Cascades, the Dalles and Priest Rapids. Its navigable waters reach within four hundred and fifty miles of the navigable waters of the Missouri and within three hundred and fifty miles of the navigable waters of the Yellowstone. Its principal tributaries are the Snake and the Willamette, the former navigable for one hundred and fifty miles and the latter for one hundred and thirty miles. A great fleet of steamboats constantly plies upon it and its tributaries, transporting the products of the vast region for which they form a system of inland transportation.

A glance at the map will show how vitally this region is interested in the improvement of its navigable rivers. Much of it must always be dependent upon water transportation. The lower Willamette and Columbia from Portland to the sea is a national highway, and the flags of the principal nations engaged in ocean navigation may be seen there. From the mouth of the Willamette to the Lower Cascades of the Columbia, a distance of fifty-three miles, there is a depth of at least ten feet at the lowest stage of water. Navigation is interrupted at the Cascades for a distance of about six miles. From the Cascades to the Dalles, a distance of forty-five miles, there is a depth of eight feet. From the Dalles to Celilo, a distance of fifteen miles, navigation is again interrupted by rapids. From Celilo to Priest Rapids, a distance of one hundred and ninety-two miles, the river is navigable, but during extreme low water the channel is tortuous and difficult of ascent. It has been greatly improved within the last few years by the Government operations.

The improvements of the Columbia River now being carried on by the Government are:

The improvement of the upper Columbia in Oregon and Washington Territory.

The construction of a canal around the Cascades of the Columbia River in Oregon; and

The improvement of the Lower Columbia in Oregon and Washington Territory.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE UPPER COLUMBIA.

The plan of improvement of the upper Columbia and Snake River consists in rock removal at various rapids. The estimate of the cost of the work now being carried on was made in 1877, and was $132,000. The total appropriation since that date has been $76,000; estimated amount to complete the work now in progress according to present plans is $56,000, the appropriation of which amount is recommended by the Chief of Engineers for that purpose.

CASCADE LOCKS.

The great work now being carried on upon the Columbia River is the construction of a canal around the Cascades of the Columbia. The plan of construction is intended to give lockage around the main rapid and open river navigation through the minor rapids below for stages of twenty feet or less at the foot of the canal. There has already been appropriated and expended for this improvement $805,000. The estimated amount required for the completion of existing projects is $1,655,397.31. Amount of appropriation asked for for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, is $500,000.

The annual rise of the Columbia occurs in May and June, and compels a suspension of the work. The work has been prosecuted at a disadvantage on account of the inadequacy of the appropriations. True economy in carrying on the work and its great commercial importance demand that it should be prosecuted as rapidly and completed as soon as the work can be done.

Charles F. Powell, esq., captain of engineers, in charge of the improvement of rivers and harbors in Oregon and Washington Territory, in his report to the Chief of Engineers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, upon the subject of inadequate appropriations for this work, says:

The uncertainty as well as inadequacy of funds is an element in the increase of cost. At the present time there are two constructions of the canal which might very advantageously be commenced if it were certain that they could be carried to a completion without interruption. To leave them partly finished during a season, either of the heavy rains or of a flood, would probably cause much damage, and so these works are postponed, to an unavoidable disadvantage of the canal.

The completion of the canal will make a good continuous navigation from the seaboard to the Dalles, forty-five miles farther. While the productive areas between the Cascades and the Dalles are limited, the Dalles is on the border of the extensive agricultural and grazing region of the upper Columbia. With the head of continuous navigation at the Dalles, a large traffic would center there. Railroad construction above is easy; below it is difficult and expensive of maintenance. The Cascade Canal and open-river improvement at the Dalles to Celilo Falls will leave only 7,000 feet of easy portage, on a good water route, between Idaho, Eastern Oregon, and Washington and the seaboard. A canal at this portage will add to the continuous route 339 miles of river navigated before any improvements were made, and 57 miles where navigation is known to be practicable. Open-river work at Priest Rapids, on the Columbia, will enable a boat to ascend 153 miles farther. North of this there are 430 miles of water to the head of navigation, broken only at two places, where permanent portages may be preferable to canals. The Columbia is second only to the Mississippi in commercial value, and possesses the advantages of stability of banks, rendering improvements at the rock-rapids good for all time.

The appropriation asked for, $500,000, is intended for guard-gate and part lock construction, wing-walls, completion of excavations and side walls of canal, and additional river improvement, if any be required. It is quite probable that the estimate can be expended to good advantage, and it is recommended that the full amount be appropriated on account of the commercial importance of the improvements and for advantageous work.

IMPROVEMENT COLUMBIA AND WILLAMETTE RIVERS FROM PORTLAND TO THE SEA.

Portland, the present commercial metropolis of the North Pacific, is situated upon the Willamette River, twelve miles from its mouth, and about one hundred and twenty-two miles from the sea. It is vitally interested in the improvement, not only of Columbia River bar, but in the improvement of the river channels from Portland to the sea, so that the largest class of ships can cross the bar at all seasons in safety and reach Portland without interruption. The obstructions to navigation above the mouth of the Columbia to Portland are set forth with particularity in the following extract from a report of a special committee of the Board of Trade of Portland, made to that board December 10, 1883:

Within the bar the river affords good and safe anchorage for the largest vessels, and no further obstruction is encountered until the Hog's Back shoal is reached. This bar is 8 miles above Astoria; it is 1,300 feet across, and the ruling depth of water is 18 feet. The next bar is at Walker's Island; it is 1,600 feet across, with 18 feet depth of water. The third obstruction is Martin's Island, 2,000 feet across, with 19 feet of water. The next is Saint Helen's bar, 32 miles below Portland. * * * Saint Helen's bar is from 1,200 to 1,600 feet across, and the depth of water prior to its improvement was 14 feet. The barrier at the mouth of the Willamette comes next. It is some 600 feet across, and before the commencement of the Government improvements, which have greatly ameliorated its condition, the depth of water was but 10 feet. There is now a depth of 18 feet on this bar, which will probably increase to 20 feet, as intended. The next is Post-Office bar, which is 3,600 feet across, with 18 feet of water, which it is expected to increase to 20 feet upon completion of present Government works. Before dredging was begun the ruling depth was 12 feet.

The last and most troublesome bar is at Swan Island, just north of the city limits of Portland. It is 4,000 feet across, with 18 feet of water. Before any dredging was done the depth of water was 10 feet. At the present time the ruling depth, if dredging was stopped, would be some 14 feet. * * * The annual freshets of the Columbia occur in May and June, during which months its flood is so greatly increased that its discharge at its mouth is estimated at 1,000,000 cubic feet of water per second. This vast volume of water carries with it the sand and gravel that form the bars, which are consequently renewed annually, and become impediments to commerce with the cessation of the freshets in July, and so continue during the shipping season. * * * The improvement of these bars by the erection of permanent structures, having in view the contraction of the channel and subsequent increase in the rapidity of the current, as suggested by the United States engineers, is undoubtedly the very best possible plan.

There is no doubt but that the improvements now being made by the Government will give a permanent channel from Portland to the sea sufficient to permit the largest vessels entering the Columbia to reach Portland without delay. In the mean time, until such permanent improvements are completed, an annual outlay is necessary for the temporary improvement of the bars by removing during the season of low water the sediment which annually accumulates upon them. The estimated amount required for the completion of the existing projects for these improvements, exclusive of temporary improvement and annual maintenance, is $183,635.

Amount of appropriation recommended for fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, for permanent and temporary improvement, $240,000.

CANAL AT THE DALLES.

In 1874 a survey was made under the direction of the Chief of Engineers of the Dalles of the Columbia, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and cost of constructing a canal and locks at that point. The work is entirely practicable, and is second in importance only to the canal at the Cascades. It should be commenced at an early day and pushed to a speedy completion. The completion of the two improvements are necessary to obtain the full benefit of either. The magnitude of the transportation interests involved is such that the Government can not and will not discontinue the work of the improvement of this great river until the products of the vast territory reached by the navigable waters of the Columbia can be transported upon steamboats from the extreme head of river navigation to the sea without interruption.

I have called attention to these several improvements of the Columbia River to show the importance in a commercial point of view of supplementing them with the improvement of the mouth of the river.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MOUTH OF THE COLUMBIA.

The river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, contained an appropriation of $7,500 for the expenses of "a board of engineers to examine in detail the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon, and report such plan, with estimates for its permanent improvement, as they approved; the said board being required to report before the next session of the present Congress." This board was duly constituted, and examined the mouth of the Columbia River and prepared plans with estimates for a permanent improvement. The plan approved is to build a jetty from the south shore near Fort Stevens. The board was unanimous as to the general character of improvement, but some difference of opinion existed as to the direction, height, and cost of the jetty. The reports are full and interesting, and may be found in Senate Executive Document No. 13, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.

It is not my purpose to enter upon a description of the plan adopted by the majority of the board; but I will content myself with quoting from the conclusions arrived at by them:

The board recommends the construction, at as early a day as possible, of a jetty, slightly convex to the north, extending from the shore near Fort Stevens in a northwesterly direction toward a point about three miles south of Cape Disappointment, this jetty to stop short of that point or be prolonged beyond it as experience may indicate to be necessary.

* * * * * * *

This jetty is expected to be mainly of stone, and the estimate is on that basis. In depths greater than about 15 feet at high water, where it is found practicable to lay mattresses, the structure should be as follows: There should first be laid a very strongly built mattress about 3 feet thick, and upon this a layer of rubble-stone 3 feet thick; then a mound of stone of large size, with a top width of not less than 5 feet, the slope on the outside to be 1 perpendicular on 3 base, and on the inside 1 perpendicular to 2 base. Where the shock of heavy seas is to be sustained this mound should be faced with beton blocks of from 5 to 20 cubic yards each. The apron which forms the foundation of the mound should project in moderately smooth water 10 or 15 feet beyond its base, and 25 feet where the seas are heavy. Where mattresses can not be placed, owing to the roughness of the water, the apron of rubble-stone should be 5 feet thick. In water less than 15 feet deep at high water the jetty should consist of a mattress 30 or 40 feet in width, covered by stone.

The jetty is intended to be brought up to the level of low water.

It is estimated that of this jetty 5,000 linear feet may be built in water of 6 feet depth or less at low water, 7,500 in water between 6 and 11 feet, 4,000 in water between 11 and 16 feet, 7,500 in water between 16 and 21 feet, and that the last 7,500 feet will need the facing of heavy beton blocks. The facing of this last 7,500 feet is expected to add 25 per cent. to what its cost would be if not so protected. The prices below are on a basis of $5 per cubic yard of the whole mass in place:

5,000 linear feet at $45	$225,000
7,500 linear feet at $80	600,000
4,000 linear feet at $140	560,000
7,500 linear feet at $310	2,325,000

* * * * * * *

It seems worthy of special remark that while there are differences of opinion among the members of the board as to the height and length to be given to the jetty starting from Point Adams, there is entire unanimity as to the necessity for such a structure. Four members of the board think the height at first need not be greater than the level of low water, but the outer end should be at a point nearly south of Cape Disappointment. Lieutenant-Colonel Mendell is of the opinion that under existing circumstances it is not expedient to extend the work beyond the limits of Clatsop spit, but he would build it to the height of mid-tide, or perhaps higher.

In conclusion, the board thinks it important to state that in an undertaking of this character, where the exposure is so great, as large a portion as possible of the whole estimate should be available before the beginning of actual construction, and the work, when commenced, should be carried forward as rapidly as practicable, with a view of attaining at the earliest day the desired object, namely, a deep channel to the sea to accommodate the great and growing commerce of which the Columbia River must be the avenue and to the growth of which the present condition of the bar is a very formidable obstacle. When operations have once begun there should be no suspension of them, as in such a case, besides the loss of time, injuries to the unfinished work and unfavorable changes in shoals and channels may be expected to such an extent as very greatly to increase the cost.

I have no doubt of the entire practicability of the work. As I have said, the board was unanimous as to the necessity and practicability and general plan of the work; and the height, length, and even direction of the jetty may be governed by experience as the work proceeds. Captain Powell, in charge of the engineering work on rivers and harbors in Oregon and Washington Territory, reports to the Chief of Engineers that in expectation of the adoption of the plan recommended a survey was made in October and November, 1882, of the south cape, or Point Adams, to extreme low water, and also an examination of the region for a place of stone supply, a good one of which was found.

It appears also probable from the satisfactory results which have been obtained from jetties in process of construction at Yaquina Bay, Coos Bay, and the mouth of the Coquille River, that there may be a very great reduction in the estimated cost of the Columbia River jetty. It is believed by many well-informed people that by the substitution of mattresses and pile-work, where that is found practicable, the cost of the improvement may be greatly reduced, possibly to one-third or one-fourth of the estimate of the engineers.

The total appropriations heretofore made by Congress for surveying and other purposes at the mouth of the Columbia River is $17,500. Amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, $500,000.

I have recently received a communication from Captain Powell submitting some interesting facts and reasons, other than those based upon the present and prospective commerce of the river, why the mouth of the Columbia should be improved. It is as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oreg., January 29, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of submitting, for such use as you may think proper, some reasons other than ones based on present or prospective commerce for improving the mouth of the Columbia River:

1. For causes common to the North Pacific coast there is almost always a heavy swell on the bar, even if breakers do not exist from shore to shore. The exceptions are during parts of summer, when the shipping is light, and for a very few days of winter, when a strong easterly wind may prevail. The entrance is subject to dense fogs and strong currents, and is partly blocked by submerged sand-spits. The safe available draught is therefore the channel depth at low tide; the rise of tide, averaging some 6 feet, is the margin for security against swell and minor deviations from the channel. This low-water depth is now, and has been for several years, about 20 feet, sometimes scant, and was from 21 to 23 feet for several years before that. On account of this small available depth the foreign commerce of the Columbia River is conducted considerably more in light-draught iron vessels than it would otherwise be. A permanent increase of depth would favor British bottoms less and American clipper ships more, and thus open a home port and a profitable carrying trade to our own craft. The British flag now predominates in numbers on the Columbia River. It does not on Puget Sound, and not in so great a measure in San Francisco Bay.

2. The season of storm and heavy seas is the one for shipment. To hold wheat until the good-weather season (summer) would entail upon the producer a storage expense for six months, and cause his product to arrive at market at about the same time as from other sources of supply, instead of at an intermediate time, as now.

3. On account of the changeableness of channel depths (they have ranged from 19 to 23 feet during past ten years) insurance and charter rates are based on the lowest depth; and if a greater draught is attempted delays for fair weather and a tide higher than the mean are calculated upon.

4. As the market for shipments is in Europe, the resulting longer voyage from Oregon, as compared with routes from New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, and other Atlantic ports, requires deeper-draught vessels than ones engaged on those routes for proportionately economical transportation. If the South Pass of the Mississippi River has a navigable depth of 26 feet, then to place the Columbia River on the same footing it should have an increase of more than 6 feet in its entrance channel. Besides the question of depth, the long voyage shuts out steam craft on account of fuel supply. In fact, steamships for charters on the Pacific coast are known as "tramps."

5. Considering the entrance as to its susceptibility for improvement, it can be noted that the surveys for 1792, 1839, 1841, 1850, and 1852 show channel depths of 27 feet, and the survey of 1868 25 feet; all of which depths are either known or believed to have been reduced to low water. It is reasonable to judge that the sand-spits can, by artificial works, be made permanent and the best natural depth recovered and maintained. The mouth of the Coquille River and the entrance to Yaquina Bay are coast entrances similar to the mouth of the Columbia, and all of whose bars are formed in the same way, although the entrance and bar pertaining to the Columbia are on a much larger scale. Jetties at the Coquille and Yaquina of the same general character and based on the same principle as the ones recommended by the board of engineers for the Columbia River have been commenced, and at their present early stage have materially improved the channels. There is an inside jetty, or, more strictly speaking, a training dike, at the entrance to Coos Bay, but the circumstances there are somewhat different, although promising results have been obtained. At the Coquille, where the work is proportionately more advanced, the increase of depth is 100 per cent.; at Yaquina, where the jetty has only reached the edge of the channel existing at time of commencement of the work, the increase of depth is 25 per cent. The same relative increase at the Columbia as at Yaquina would give 25 feet depth, and one-half the same as at the Coquille would give 30 feet—just about that which is needed.

6. When considering the probable cost of the Columbia jetty it should be noticed that the estimate of the majority of the board of engineers ($3,710,000) is based on a stone and beton block construction, although the use of wood is recommended in part if found to be more economical. Now, experience at the Oregon coast jetties does show that wood, in shape of piles and brush, can be advantageously and economically used, and the estimate for the Columbia jetty should be reduced considerably. The very liberal contingency named in the estimate of the board can be omitted in case of large and prompt appropriations; but not, on account of danger to destruction of an incomplete work at a place of great exposure, for small and irregular appropriations.

Very respectfully, yours,

CHAS. F. POWELL,
Captain of Engineers.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Perhaps I should add, to prevent my remarks from being misunderstood, that while the bar at the mouth of the Columbia is an obstacle to navigation, it is far from being as dangerous as has been represented. The large steamers plying between Portland and San Francisco come and go and cross it with great regularity. The few disasters which have occurred there have occurred through carelessness in attempts to cross in the night, or in a fog, or in attempting to sail in during unfavorable weather, and in nearly every instance without a local pilot. Ships, nearly every day in the year, except during unusual storms, sail or steam or are towed across the bar; and a comparison of the casualties which have occurred upon the Columbia River bar with those which have occurred upon the bars of the other great rivers of the United States would not prove unfavorable to the former.

Mr. President, I shall not enter into a discussion of the constitutional power of Congress to aid by appropriations of money works for the improvement of our great rivers and harbors. Whatever differences of opinion once existed upon that subject, it has become the settled policy of the Government to aid such works. No more important question than the question of internal transportation to-day demands the careful attention of Congress. So great are the interests involved that in my judgment true statesmanship and the highest consideration for the public welfare demand that every improvement to aid which is within the constitutional power and reasonably within the financial ability of the Federal Government, and which will improve and increase the facilities for and cheapen the cost of transportation of the products of our industries from the place of production to domestic and foreign markets, should receive favorable consideration from Congress. While the question of the regulation and control of railroad transportation now being forced upon the attention of Congress involves important questions of power and of policy, no such questions embarrass the subject of the improvement of our rivers and harbors.

I am pleased to note that there is a disposition on the part of Congress to take some steps in the direction of removing what have been termed by the Senator from Maine the burdens and barnacles placed upon American commerce by our own laws. The important question of reviving our commerce demands the serious attention of Congress. During the present session we have heard the navigation laws of Great Britian eulogized, I think perhaps justly, and the ascendency of her foreign commerce ascribed to the wisdom and liberality of her laws. Her supremacy on the seas is due to the growth of her foreign trade. Her foreign commerce has stimulated and built up her home industries, and they in turn have fed her commerce until her experience, in a manner at least, justifies the saying of one of her people that "whoever commands the sea commands the trade of the world; whoever commands the trade of the world commands the riches of the world, and whoever commands the riches of the world commands the world itself."

I repeat, therefore, that it is a hopeful sign for the commercial and material future of this country that Congress is disposed to take a step in the direction of a revision of our navigation laws. But our foreign commerce is in my judgment of secondary importance to our internal and interstate commerce. Transportation is the most important part of commerce, and the internal transportation of the country is one of its most vital interests. Without it there can be no real development of its resources. Salubrious climate, productive soil, favorable position, and unbounded resources, all combined, are of but little avail to build up a country until industry is stimulated, trade induced, and the operations of commerce set in motion by means of internal transportation. Until then the useful metals remain undisturbed in the mines, the forests retain their primeval stillness and proportions, the soil is vexed only to supply the immediate wants of the occupants, the grain is not raised for export, manufactures are limited, trade does not expand beyond the proportions of neighborhood barter, cities do not grow, the country languishes.

There is much discussion upon the subject of protection for manufacturing industries, but a greater question demanding the attention of Congress is encouragement to our agricultural interests. Our national prosperity and the success of all other industries are dependent upon the success of our agricultural interests. Whatever appropriations are made by Congress for the improvement of the Columbia River and its tributaries will be primarily for the benefit of the farmers whose products are to be transported upon them, but directly or indirectly the beneficial results of such expenditures will be felt by all the diversified interests of the people of that region.

It has been well said that—

> The National Government has wisely lent its aid among others to construct three great lines of railroad to the Pacific coast. * * * They will be * * * overburdened with the traffic that will grow with their growth and extend with their connections. But the great and magnificent rivers of the West are never overburdened, they are the nation's arteries formed at the creation to relieve the ever-fructifying earth of her superfluous wealth of production, completed to aid civilized man in carrying forward the command of his Creator to subdue the earth. All they need from man is very little continuous care to free them from obstructions, and all expenditures made for this object repay more than fifty-fold.

The Pacific Northwest—original Oregon—appeals to the national Congress for that recognition which the sacrifices and the fidelity to this Government of the pioneers who settled, held, and saved to the United States that magnificent domain—her long isolation, her vast territory, great resources, the necessities of her great and already increasing commerce, and her undoubted and immediate future development deserve. She asks the aid necessary to prosecute the improvements of her rivers and harbors now in progress, and to commence the important work of improving the mouth of the great river which forms the natural outlet to the sea for her surplus productions.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the same order be made in regard to the bill (S. 702) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the mouth of Yaquina Bay, in the State of Oregon; and the bill (S. 703) making appropriation for continuing the construction of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ELIJAH W. PENNY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first bill on the Calendar under Rule IX will now be reported.

A bill (S. 544) granting an increase of pension to Elijah W. Penny was announced as first in order.

Mr. JACKSON. There is an adverse report on that bill, and unless some Senator desires to have it considered now I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. GARLAND. A motion to reconsider was entered, and the vote postponing the bill indefinitely was reconsidered. I do not know what Senator made the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Senate is now proceeding under Rule IX, a bill when reached in order does not go over under objection.

Mr. JACKSON. I have no objection to its consideration except that there is an adverse report in the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed, and it was placed on the Calendar.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Indiana who made the motion I know is called from the Chamber on special business, and I suggest that the bill be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing it over informally on the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

QUORUM OF SUPREME COURT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 309) to amend section 673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the quorum of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. GARLAND. When this bill was reached before, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was absent under an order of the Senate, and I did not care to have it considered in his absence, because of the views he had expressed when the question was before Congress at a former session.

The first part of the bill relates to the matter of the quorum of the Supreme Court. Section 673 of the Revised Statutes now provides:

> SEC. 673. The Supreme Court of the United States shall consist of a Chief-Justice of the United States and eight associate justices, any six of whom shall constitute a quorum.

It has been found that that has operated very disadvantageously at times; that the number required for a quorum is so large that at times there are not that number in attendance when the court opens; and, upon consideration, the committee thought it best to fix a quorum at simply a majority, so that, as there are nine justices, any five will be a quorum to do business. That, I believe, there is no objection to; none has been urged.

The other portion of the bill prohibits any one of the judges of the Supreme Court from sitting on the trial of a cause in that court which he had tried in the court below. It has always occurred to me that the present practice in that regard was to a certain extent a denial of a fair trial to a plaintiff in a writ of error, because his case comes to be tried anew by a court where there are nine judges, with one already prejudged against the party. It seems to me that does not give him a fair chance for his subject-matter of litigation. That is the sole point in this part of the bill. It was incorporated in what is known as the Davis bill, the court-of-appeals bill, when it was before the Senate several sessions ago, by a very large vote, the amendment then being offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I think it is a very necessary safeguard to put in, in order to have a fair and impartial trial on appeals and writs of error in the highest court of the country.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose the question whether a judge who has made a ruling at nisi prius should be permitted to take part in the determination of the exceptions to that ruling in a full court is one which gentlemen consider very much in a light colored by the public feeling in their own States and the experience there. Now, what may be the experience of other parts of the country I do not know, but this I do know, that in my own State the law has permitted the judges to sit in banc in the determination of questions upon which they have ruled below, and there not only has been no complaint, but I think the profession in our State would be nearly unanimous in the opinion that a great public advantage had come from it. The judge makes his ruling at nisi prius with a knowledge of the application of a particular legal formula with reference to the particular state of facts, a knowledge which the full court can not get often from the most particular and accurate report, and it seems to me very important, if he be a man of ordinary judicial quality, that he should be permitted to explain and defend his opinion below. The whole object of the proceeding is not that a man shall get a new trial; it is that the law shall be correctly and properly administered.

This provision would exclude very often the most capable members of the court from sitting on questions of great public consequence. Of course the case goes very much further than the determination of the individual controversy. The decision makes a prevailing rule for all time until overruled or changed by statute. From one part of the country come up questions of civil law; from another neighboring portion of the country come important questions of Spanish and Mexican land law, and French land law, and certain members of the bench who will be the ones most likely to sit below on that class of questions are those who are the only ones who are qualified by experience and study and legal learning to deal with these questions. Now, to deprive the court of the aid of such judges seems to me to be very bad policy. The idea that Chief-Justice Marshall could not have sat in dealing with a constitutional question that had come up in the first circuit when he was on his circuit seems to me a very unwise one.

Without wishing to take up the time of the Senate by a full debate of this question, I wish simply to record my opinion that the present system is the best one, and that we should deprive the public of the advantage very often of a capable and able judge in guarding against an evil which is dingy and doubtful, and that would be apt to be felt in a very few cases.

I move to strike out the portion of the bill which contains that provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator indicate to the Secretary the part of the bill which he proposes to strike out?

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator can reach the same purpose by asking for a division of the question on the first clause, and then take the vote on agreeing to the second. However, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. It is not the parliamentary method of dealing with a bill to take a separate vote on separate sections.

Mr. GARLAND. There is but one section.

Mr. HOAR. I have no right to do that; I have a right to move to strike out.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; and you have a right to do the other; but I do not care which you exercise.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that we have the parliamentary right to call for a division of the question on one clause.

Mr. GARLAND. Rule XVIII is clear as to the right to call for a division of any question containing a separate matter, but still I do not care.

Mr. HOAR. You can not divide a bill.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator can take his own course as to that; but I wish to make a few observations on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "thereof," in line 5 of the bill, in the following words:

> And no member of said court shall sit at the hearing or participate in the decision of any cause in the decision of which he acted in the court below.

Mr. GARLAND. The chief essence and value of all trials consists in their fairness. A trial that is not a fair trial is no trial at all in law. When we arraign a man for breaking into a hen-roost or the smallest kind of a larceny, we ask the jurors if they have heard anything of the case, if they have expressed an opinion about it. Here comes a case to the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal, and one of the judges before whom that appeal is to be tried has already determined the case; he has made up his mind about it, he has prejudged it, and on the commonest principle of trial he would be incompetent to sit in that case.

It is not worth while to cite the example of Chief-Justice Marshall or chief-justice anybody else; we are dealing now with human nature, and when you tell me that as a rule you can approach a judge who has heard a case argued upon the circuit and has made up his opinion and delivered that opinion and decided the case, as a fair judge on appeal, as one who is not predisposed or prepossessed one way or the other, you tell me something that the commonest understanding of human nature does not bear out.

Mr. HOAR. Would it disturb the Senator if I put a question to him?

Mr. GARLAND. If you simply put a question it will not disturb me in the least; but it will agitate me if you make a speech.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GARLAND. I will yield, but not for a speech.

Mr. HOAR. I had not made any proposition to make a speech.

Mr. GARLAND. But I was afraid you would, and I made the suggestion in advance. [A pause.] If you will tell me that you can go to a judge, I do not care who he is, and convince him to the contrary after he has heard the case argued upon the circuit and made his decision, I will get the man who can do it to go up and see if he can convince the bronze statue of Tom Paine and convert it to Christianity. I do not say this to reflect upon any man or any judge. But let us look at it for a moment.

There is my distinguished friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. He has presided over courts. He calls the case of A against B. He hears it argued. He looks at the books, examines the authorities, and makes up his opinion. It will be a very long time, and it will take more than a common argument to convince that judge that he has made a mistake after hearing the case argued and examining the authorities, and have him say to the country, "That is all a mistake; I committed an error, I admit it." I will take any other Senator or any other judge. No person likes to write himself down as in error after he has heard a case argued and submitted an opinion upon it. That is the proposition that I make here.

So I say that when a man comes with his case before the Supreme Court with one judge against him he then has but eight uncommitted minds to appeal to. He has one out of nine against him to begin with, and so it is not a fair trial. Section 614 of the Revised Statutes provides that:

> A district judge sitting in a circuit court shall not give a vote in any case of appeal or error from his own decision, but may assign the reasons for such decision.

Why do you cut out the district judge when you appeal to the circuit court where he sits with the circuit judge? The reason, I think, is a good one, and it should run clear through to the Supreme Court judge. The peculiar knowledge that the judge of the Supreme Court gets while sitting upon the circuit cuts both ways. Sometimes he gets a little too much knowledge of the case; sometimes he gets a little too much information and pressure in reference to the parties.

I have always believed it would be the best for the court of last resort to try a case as by an algebraic formula and not to know anything about Mr. Smith, or Mr. Jones, or Mr. Brown, or any one else in the case, but simply try it by a formula, if you please, and know nothing about what occurred on the circuit.

As to this special knowledge, I should like to know what there is in land-grant cases in New Mexico, or cases in New Orleans or any portion of Louisiana as to the civil law, that you can not find in the libraries here at this day and time, authorities by which you may post yourself in reference to them. Here are text-books written in the original language and the laws and reports. I can not see that any disadvantage accrues to a party by having a judge sit on the case because of his peculiar knowledge of the land laws or of the land grants of New Mexico or the civil law of Louisiana, as the case may be.

It just resolves itself down plainly to this: We have already the example of district judges being prohibited from hearing in the circuit court a case they have tried in the district court; and, sift it as you please, whether it is one chief-justice or another, it does not amount to a fair trial when a party comes before the Supreme Court on appeal with a judge who has decided against him below sitting to hear the appeal and have a vote in deciding it.

Mr. HOAR. The logic of the Senator from Arkansas would require him to have a measure which would poll the Supreme Court in all cases and find out whether the judges had any legal opinions on the questions involved in issue.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think that would be very bad.

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. GARLAND. No; I am not seeking to make a speech.

Mr. HOAR. I beg my friend to observe that.

Mr. GARLAND. I am not making a speech; I am making a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARLAND. I simply made a suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. The difference between my honorable friend and me is that he makes his interruptions without asking my leave, and I asked his leave before I proposed to make one.

Mr. GARLAND. I granted it, and you did not take it.

Mr. HOAR. I did not understand you to grant it, sir.

The judges are supposed to be men learned in the law, which implies having opinions on legal questions. We do not argue cases before them or submit cases to them on the theory that they are only like a jury, with their minds blank and without an inclination one way or the other. We suppose that the tribunal is so constituted that the final opinion of the judge on hearing and argument will be sound, and right, and just.

Take the case of a court equally divided; how shall the scale preponderate one way or the other? Shall the party who has obtained a ruling in his favor in the court below on full argument and hearing be deprived of the right to the opinion of that member of the court who has sat below? Why is it that he should not have the right to the judgment, the opinion of the full court, and not of a member less than the full court?

The Senator says that it is impossible, that you might as well undertake to convert a bronze statue as to change the mind of a judge who has once made up his mind in the court below. The Senator's experience in such matters differs very much from mine, if that be his opinion. Again and again I could name in my own practice, I could name from the bench of my own State, cases well known, cases of great public importance, where the judges have given opinions overruling the opinions they had themselves expressed at nisi prius. Of course everybody knows that a nisi prius opinion is an opinion given without the opportunity ordinarily for the full and thorough examination of the case and the authorities which is had in the hearing in banc; and the fact that the judge had ruled one way at nisi prius, with a man possessing the judicial quality either of integrity or fairness, or independence, or intelligence, would be ordinarily a matter of the very slightest weight.

I could, if it were worth while to take up the attention of the Senate, recount from memory instance after instance of important causes where the judges in my own State and part of the country have given opinions, as the organ of the full bench, reversing the opinions they had given at the trial below. I do not believe any member of this body who has ever sat on a bench would admit that it was any harder for him to deal fairly with a case that he had heard at nisi prius than with a case that had been heard by one of his associates. The prevailing motive in the mind of the judge, other than the motive to do his duty, is to go into the history of jurisprudence and into the reports with opinions and judgments, which will be recognized and accepted by the profession and the public as sound. The judge speaks in giving his opinion, not merely to the parties to the suit, he speaks to the profession, to the generation, and to generations after, centuries perhaps after the time when the original opinion is given, and the question is very unimportant to him whether he turned out to be right in the first impression compared with being recognized and having his opinion recognized as a clear and shining beacon-light along the pathways of jurisprudence to those who come after him.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. President, I am in favor of the passage of this bill as it stands. My experience is entirely different from that of the Senator from Massachusetts in the matter of which he speaks. In our State it was found necessary to enact a law just like this, and at the time it was enacted I took occasion to examine the statutes of the States of the Union, and I venture to say it will be found now that three-fourths of the States of this Union have a provision like that which is contained in the bill before us. The idea can not be correct that when a judge has passed upon a question of law in the court below, has formed an opinion, has given a construction to any law, he is wholly impartial when he comes to consider the case in the court above. It may be the presumption that he is impartial, but it is a presumption contrary to the fact.

I believe there should be an impartial hearing on the question of law when it comes to the full bench, and I deem it absolutely necessary that the man who has given an opinion in the court below should not act in the decision of that question. He becomes a champion of his own opinion, it seems to me, and his mind is not as open as if he had not formed an opinion and expressed it in the court below.

I hope the bill will pass without amendment.

Mr. VEST. When what was known as the Davis bill reorganizing the judiciary into circuits was before the Senate this question was elaborately discussed, I think the discussion lasted for some two or three hours upon some three or four successive days, and the Senate by a very large majority, my recollection is at least three or four to one, decided in favor of the principle which is incorporated in the bill advocated by the Senator from Arkansas, that the nisi prius judges should not sit in the appellate tribunal. I think almost the universal testimony of Senators upon this floor who expressed themselves at that time (I recollect distinctly the argument made by the Senator from New York now before me [Mr. LAPHAM] and by other Senators) was against the practice of allowing nisi prius judges to sit in the appellate court.

In my own State of Missouri we tested this thing very fully and fairly. We organized there some years ago what was known as a district court in which five circuit court judges sat in banc upon the cases that they had tried on the circuits. My experience was, and I undertake to say that the decisions of that district court will show, that not one case was reversed out of twenty; and yet in the supreme court to which the cases afterwards went it is safe to say that one was reversed in about three or four.

An appeal from the decision of a judge is an attack upon his judgment. The Senator from Massachusetts may deliver, and I do not question their propriety, eulogies upon judicial character and judicial fairness; yet we all know that judges are simply men.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Senator means to state it as a fact that the judge regards an appeal as an attack upon his judgment?

Mr. VEST. Yes, as a matter of course. I mean to say that when you appeal from the judgment of a judge it is stating to him that you think he is wrong, that he has erred as to the law. It is an attack upon his private opinion, and as a matter of course he would be a little more or less than man unless he undertook to defend it.

I do not know that I have ever verified it by actual observation or actual examination, but I have heard it stated that the greatest lawyer who ever sat upon the Supreme Bench of the United States, Chief-Justice Marshall, was never known to reverse his opinion, especially as to constitutional law, when he had expressed it upon the circuit.

Moreover, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] has suggested, the judge at nisi prius from whom an appeal is taken becomes necessarily the advocate afterward of his own judgment and of his own opinion. Speaking with all due respect of the judiciary, the man who delivers the opinion below is found to advocate it afterward in the appellate court, where the lawyer upon the other side can not meet him face to face to answer his argument. On account of his association with the rest of the appellate bench he has their confidence and he has a peculiar position, which gives his arguments made in the appellate tribunal an undue influence, I submit of course not in any corrupt sense, but an undue influence in regard to the final decision of the cause.

A trial on an appeal should be a new trial; and when you try the same case before the same judge with the odds against you, with his pride of opinion, with his disposition to maintain his own judgment, it is not a new trial really and emphatically within the meaning of the law.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think the provision of the bill proposed to be stricken out is a very important one. The bar, by a very large majority, so far as I am apprised of their opinion in my own section, desire a change in the law to this effect; and so far as I am advised of the opinion of the lawyers of the country generally it is to the same effect.

The argument of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts seems to me to rest upon a radically erroneous basis. It assumes that judges never decide causes from any other than proper motives; that they are infallible; that they never have political ambition; that they never decide against their own judgment and knowledge of the law; and it excludes all that class of cases where judges may be actuated, as they often are, by improper motives.

Again, what is the principle on which an appeal to another tribunal is taken? It is for a new hearing, for a new trial, for a new consideration, not by the same person but by another and a different authority. If that be the principle, if we are to appeal from the judgment of one to the judgment of another, why violate it by keeping the same person as a part of the constituent tribunal? Why falsify the very proposition upon which we are proceeding when we take the judge who has sat and pronounced and affirmed a judgment, and make him a part of a tribunal which has been selected because it was another and a different tribunal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the quorum of the Supreme Court of the United States, and for other purposes."

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

The bill (S. 15) to provide for the further protection of citizens of the United States and others against the violation of certain rights secured to them by the Constitution of the United States, was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. CALL. This is a very important bill and one likely to lead to discussion. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] if he desires to proceed with it to-day?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who had a large share in the original preparation of the bill, is absent from his seat at this time and I understand is absent from the Capitol. I should not want the bill to lose its place, but I am quite willing, if any Senator has any business which he desires to have dealt with this afternoon, to let it be laid aside informally.

Mr. CALL. I suggest that it be allowed to go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. Without prejudice.

Mr. CALL. Without prejudice.

Mr. GARLAND. When it was reached before, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts I made the suggestion that the bill hold its place on the Calendar. I suggest that we make the same order now.

Mr. HOAR. I believe the Senator from Vermont does not himself propose to discuss the bill at length. I have an impression that that is his feeling about it; but still as he, as the Senator from Arkansas is aware, had a good deal to do with framing it, I should rather he should be present when the discussion of the bill takes place.

Mr. GARLAND. Then let it go over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to letting the bill go over informally, holding its place on the Calendar under Rule IX? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

MARITIME LIENS.

The bill (S. 415) regulating maritime liens and remedies and to secure uniformity in the enforcement of the rights of material-men in courts of admiralty was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. That is an adverse report. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is proceeding under Rule IX, and an objection does not carry a bill over.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask unanimous consent, as the report is adverse, that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill being passed over, the report being adverse.

Mr. LAPHAM. I have no objection to that course if the bill does not lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing the bill over informally, it holding its place on the Calendar? ["Consent!"] The Chair hears no objection.

JOHN FRASER.

The bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill has been passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It stands upon a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOAR. The bill provides for compensation to a gentleman who was acting as the architect of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, who was called to fill the place of Supervising Architect during the suspension of Mr. Hill. The Committee on Claims allowed to him compensation at the rate of the salary fixed for the higher service. After the bill passed the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] thought he could satisfy the Senate that in the peculiar circumstances of this case Mr. Fraser ought to be paid for both services, contrary to the general policy of the Senate; and there are some very strong reasons for that view. I see the Senator from Nebraska is not present. I think the bill had better stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make the request that the bill be passed over?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the motion to reconsider may be passed over informally, the bill holding its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

GEORGE H. CARLYLE.

The bill (S. 375) for the relief of George H. Carlyle was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I make the same suggestion in that case, there being an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the bill be informally passed over, there being an adverse report. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. Unless some Senator wishes to oppose the adverse report, I suggest that the bill be disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill must have been placed upon the Calendar at the request of some Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. I intended to request that the bill be passed over until the attorney, who is now absent from the city, can have an opportunity of preparing a petition for a rehearing and a reconsideration of the case, which he desires, as he has additional evidence and some points of law to present that were overlooked by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing over the bill informally, leaving it in its place on the Calendar? The Chair hears none.

HEIRS OF MAURICE GRIVOT.

The bill (S. 87) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay Marie Emma Nicholas and Anne Elodie Jaques, heirs of Maurice Grivot, late of New Orleans, La., $962.85, in satisfaction of money and property taken by the Government and in full payment of their claim.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON January 23, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 87) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

That this committee had this case under consideration during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress and made a favorable report thereon, which upon reconsideration they again adopt, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 392) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot, having examined the same, make the following report:

That Marie Emma Nicholas and Anne Elodie Jaques are the heirs at law of Maurice Grivot, who was a citizen of the State of Louisiana; that said Grivot was a depositor in the branch of the Louisiana State Bank at New Orleans, and that on the 17th day of August, 1863, there stood to his credit in said bank the sum of $1,574.79, which was taken possesion of by the military authorities of the United States, then in the occupation of the city of New Orleans, under the following circumstances:

On the 17th of August, 1863, an order was issued, by command of Major-General Banks, then in command of the Department of the Gulf, requiring the several banks and banking associations of New Orleans to pay over, without delay, to the chief quartermaster of the Army, or to such officer of his department as he might designate, all money in their possession belonging to or standing upon their books to the credit of any person registered as an enemy of the United States, or engaged in any manner in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called "Confederate States, or who should have been, or might hereafter be, convicted of rendering any aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States." The order declared that those funds would "be held and accounted for by the Quartermaster's Department, subject to the future adjudication of the Government of the United States."

Under and in obedience to this order the Branch of the Louisiana State Bank paid over to the acting quartermaster the balance standing on its books to the credit of Maurice Grivot, who seems to have been registered as an enemy of the United States. It appears from the receipts and accounts of the quartermaster to whom this balance of $1,574.79 belonging to Grivot was paid that the sum of $611.94 was received in confederate funds and the sum of $962.85 in par or current funds. Why a portion of the amount was paid and received in confederate funds is not explained. The United States authorities do not appear to have made any use of the confederate funds. The par funds ($962.85), with like funds received under said General Order No. 202 from other banks, amounting in the aggregate to $44,692.43, were taken up in August, 1863, and expended by the quartermaster for the ordinary purposes of the Quartermaster's Department. The order of the commanding general directed the fund "to be held and accounted for by the Quartermaster's Department, subject to the future adjudication of the Government of the United States." And the chief quartermaster, in his order designating Captain McClure, acting quartermaster, as the officer to receive said funds, directed him to "hold this money and account for it to the United States Treasury."

It further appears that subsequently, in proceedings under the act of July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," in the case of the "United States vs. The right, title, interest, and estate of M. Grivot in and to household effects," the sum of $220.34 was paid into the Treasury of the United States by the clerk of the United States district court of Louisiana. This sum of $220.34 was the proceeds realized by the sale of said Grivot's household effects under said libel suit. No judicial proceedings were ever had to confiscate or condemn the funds of Grivot received from the bank. The present bill proposes to return to the heirs of said Grivot the sum of $1,795.13 (being the amounts received by the Government from the bank and from the confiscated household effects), with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from August, 1863, until paid.

The proceedings to confiscate the household effects of Grivot are presumed to have been regularly conducted in pursuance of law, and operated to divest him and his heirs of all right, title, and interest in and to the property condemned and the proceeds realized from its sale. Your committee can see no ground or principle upon which the heirs can properly make any equitable claim to this part of the fund; nor can they recognize the liability of the United States to return to the claimants in par funds the amount ($611.94) the bank turned over to the quartermaster in confederate funds, which appear to have been worthless to the Government.

The only remaining question raised by the facts and circumstances above detailed is whether there is any duty or obligation, legal or equitable, on the part of the Government to return or pay over to the heirs of Grivot the amount of par funds belonging to him which were received from the bank.

At the close of the war Grivot sought redress against the bank in the State courts of Louisiana, but failed to recover, the court holding that the military order under which the money was paid over was a protection to the bank. He or his heirs, therefore, have only the Government to look to for reimbursement, and whether such reimbursement should be made by the United States properly involves a consideration of the validity of General Order No. 202, under which the fund was turned over. The object and purpose of the order was not to supply military wants and necessities, but simply to impound and confiscate the moneys of persons registered as enemies of the United States. Had the commanding general of the department in August, 1863, authority to issue such an order? This is not an open question. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Planters' Bank vs. Union Bank (16 Wallace, 494 to 497) had occasion to pass upon the validity of this very order, and it was there decided, in December, 1872, that General Banks had no authority to make said order, and that it was wholly invalid. The following extract from the opinion of the court will show the reasoning and principle on which the decision was rested. The court says:

"The validity of the order is, therefore, the first thing to be considered. It was made, as we have seen, on the 17th of August, 1863. Then the city of New Orleans was in quiet possession of the United States forces. It had been captured more than fifteen months before that time, and undisturbed possession was maintained ever after its capture. Hence the order was no attempt to seize property 'flagrante bello,' nor was it a seizure for immediate use of the Army. It was simply an attempt to confiscate private property, which, though it may be subjected to confiscation by legislative authority, is, according to the modern law of nations, exempt from capture as booty of war. Still, as the war had not ceased, though it was not flagrant in the district, and as General Banks was in command of the district, it must be conceded that he had power to do all that the laws of war permitted, except so far as he was restrained by the pledged faith of the Government or by the effect of Congressional legislation. A pledge, however, had been given that rights of property should be respected. When the city was surrendered to the Army under General Butler a proclamation was issued, dated May 1, 1862, one clause of which was as follows: 'All the rights of property of whatever kind will be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States.' This, as was remarked in the case of the Venice (2 Wallace, 258), 'only reiterated the rules established by the legislative and executive action of the National Government in respect to the portions of the States in insurrection occupied and controlled by the troops of the Union.' That action, it was said, indicated the policy of the Government to be, not to regard districts occupied and controlled by national troops as in actual insurrection, or their inhabitants as subject in most respects to treatment as enemies. Substantial, complete, and permanent military occupation and control was held to draw after it the full measure of protection to persons and property consistent with a necessary subjection to military government.

"We do not assert that anything in General Butler's proclamation exempted property within the occupied district from liability to confiscation as enemies' property, if in truth it was such. All that is now said is that after that proclamation private property in the district was not subject to military seizure as booty of war. But admitting as we do that private property remained subject to confiscation, and also that the proclamation applied exclusively to inhabitants of the district, it is undeniable that confiscation was possible only to the extent and in the manner provided by the acts of Congress. These acts were passed on the 6th August, 1861, and on the 17th July, 1862. No others authorized the confiscation of private property, and they prescribed the manner in which alone confiscation could be made. They designated Government agents for seizing enemies' property, and they directed the mode of procedure for its condemnation in the courts. The system devised was necessarily exclusive. No authority was given to a military commandant, as such, to effect any confiscation. * * * It is therefore of little importance to inquire what, under the general laws of war, are the rights of a conqueror, for during the recent civil war the Government of the United States asserted no general right in virtue of conquest to compel the payment of private debts to itself. On the contrary, it was impliedly disclaimed, except so far as the acts of 1861 and 1862 asserted it. These enactments, declaring that private property belonging to certain classes of persons might be confiscated, in the manner particularly described, are themselves expressive of an intent that the rights of conquest should not be exercised against private property except in the cases mentioned and in the manner pointed out. * * * It follows, then, that the order of General Banks was one which he had no authority to make, and that his direction to the bank to pay the quartermaster of the Army the debt due the Planters' Bank was wholly invalid."

The Supreme Court having thus decided that the attempt of the commanding general of the department to enforce by military order the confiscation acts of Congress against the property and effects of rebellious citizens of the United States was without authority and invalid, and it further appearing that there has never been any judicial procedure for the condemnation of the funds thus seized as directed and required by the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862, so as to divest and defeat the private rights and interests of the owner, it follows that the United States acquired no valid title under that seizure to the money of Grivot, who before his death received full and complete amnesty from the Government, which removed the only ground on which confiscation or an actual divestiture of his interests could be predicated. The possession obtained by the Government under the unauthorized order of its commanding officer conferred upon it no higher or stronger right to this fund than that acquired by a seizure under the captured-and-abandoned-property acts. The Government simply got possession of the fund, with the right to have it condemned and confiscated in the exclusive mode and manner directed and prescribed by the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862, but before exercising this right, which was necessary to a valid divestiture of the owner's title and to perfect its own, the Government confers upon the owner complete amnesty for all the past offenses which entitled it to confiscate the fund. This grant of amnesty was a voluntary surrender and abandonment by the United States of its right to complete and perfect that judicial condemnation of the fund which was necessary to defeat the owner's interest. Having been pardoned before any legal and valid divestiture of his rights was had, the acts of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court entitle the owners or his legal representatives to the full benefit of a restoration of his property as completely as though no seizure had ever been made or military confiscation attempted.

Under the authority of Armstrong vs. United States (13 Wallace, 154) and Pargoud vs. United States (16 Wallace, 156) the claimants in the present case, if they could sue the Government, would be entitled to recover this fund. Will Congress deny to them, simply because it has the power to withhold, what the courts of the United States would allow as a valid right? To do so would be the exercise of a punitive power, destructive of the rights which the clemency of the executive department have lawfully restored. It would present a singular anomaly for Congress to deny rights recognized by the judicial and executive departments of the Government.

Your committee therefore consider that the money belonging to Grivot to the extent of $962.85, received, as aforesaid, by the Government in par funds, should be restored to his heirs at law; and they accordingly recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I think this is a test case. It is true it involves but a small amount of money, it is apparently of trivial importance, but if it be decided by the Senate on the principles involved in this report of the committee, it must necessarily open the way by precedent and by authority for paying out not only this little sum of $900, but millions upon millions of money to compensate for moneys and property taken by the United States during the war.

I can not see, on reading this report of the committee over and over again, upon what principle the committee could recommend to the Senate that this claim be paid. The argument is finely drawn; the logic is well spun out; no man can tell from the report exactly where and how the general rule, the general law, is affected by this bill. A decision of the Supreme Court is quoted here which, in my judgment, has no application to this case. The very report shows that in regard to household effects and other property taken during the war, where the matter was contested, the United States held the property, and the courts decided that it was lawfully held and taken at about the same time and in the same manner and under the same circumstances as this. Is it contended that the heirs, or the principal himself if living, could come into any court authorized by law and recover this money against the United States under the general principles of international law?

This money, as I believe, was a part of a fund seized and taken by the confederate government and ordered to be held in the Louisiana State Bank, which was the depository of the confederate money in New Orleans, for the purposes and uses of the confederate government, as much the property of and subject to the control and to be used for the use and benefit of the confederate authorities as any money in their treasury or under their control. It did not consist of United States funds alone. There were gathered together confederate money and other money in one sum. If this Government is liable to pay back this amount of money, it is just as much liable to pay back the similar sum in confederate money, or what was its value at the time it was taken, as it is this, and the committee should have so reported. If there is any reason for paying back to the heirs of this man any money whatever, it is to pay back the value of the property taken, and this committee should have ascertained what at the date of the capture of this property the confederate money was worth and should have so reported, and it would have so reported but for the fact that that would have been a monstrous proposition which would not meet with favor here; and yet these heirs have as much right to the value of the confederate money on deposit in this bank as to the value of the other money deposited. There is no reason for the distinction. Whether it was money or property, whether it was bullion or confederate notes, whatever was the value of the property taken by the United States, if the Government is liable to refund any of it, it is liable to refund it all in full.

I call the attention of Senators to this opening case; it is the first one of this particular class which has been presented to the Senate. On the reasoning of the committee, on the references of the committee, on this bird's-eye view, this far-off, little-end-of-the-telescope view of the decision of the United States courts, which does not in my judgment apply at all to a class of cases like this; on this report, which pretends to pay back the value of one kind of property seized, but does not pretend on the same principle and for the same reason to pay the value of another kind seized at the same time, coming within the same requirements, coming within the decisions, if either part does come within the decision of the Supreme Court—on this we are asked to pay back a portion of this deposit. There is a lame place in this report to which I call the attention of the eager and watchful chairman of the Committee on Claims, which has escaped his attention, and which I have had occasion to consider in this case and in other cases; and I also invoke the attention of the gentleman who made the report, of whose reports I have had the pleasure to say heretofore, and also from my association with him as a member of the Committee on Claims in the last Congress, that he is generally careful and prudent and watchful, and reports according to the facts and according to the law as he understands it; but I think he has overlooked in this case the essential elements that should govern it.

This $900 is of but little importance. The Government can vote that at any time as a gratuity, or as an equity, or as a bonus, or from sympathy with heirs, or in any way it pleases; but upon this report and upon its reasoning I venture to say that in the Treasury of the United States, subject to a like call and subject to a like report from that or any other committee having charge of such things, there are millions upon millions of dollars to be affected. The most dangerous bills that have ever been introduced into Congress, the most dangerous bills that ever have been passed in either branch of Congress, are those of small amount, connected with a kind of sympathy for heirs, for widows, for persons who have departed from the scene of active life, and have left to inherit legacies, not of having been engaged in the rebellion, but of possible claims against this Government.

Sir, if there was through the whole period of the war any city or any territory or any property taken under the rules of war subject to seizure, subject to appropriation, subject to the uses of the Government, it was the property within New Orleans of banks and capital placed there and used there without stint and without restriction subject to the order and the authority of the confederate government. This was a part of that fund, disguise it as you may. Maurice Grivot was in actual and open and daily and continuous rebellion against this Government. The report shows it; the facts prove it. Even his household effects were seized and sold; he could not hold the furniture and the books in his house at New Orleans because he was an open, avowed, rebellious enemy of the United States, and the courts decided that the seizure of that property was lawful. It was not a confiscation; it was the seizure of the property of an enemy taken flagrante bello. New Orleans was captured; New Orleans was a rebel territory and city; it was captured by the strong arm of war; it was subdued under our guns; it yielded only to an inevitable necessity. In all that city and in all that region there were no forces and no powers and no influences and no voices during all of that time raised in behalf of the Government of the United States. It was captured and subject by the laws of war to all the extremities to which a beleagured and captured city could be exposed. It does not answer to say that the commanders of our forces issued lenient orders; it does not answer to say that as little hardships and as few trials were imposed on this captured and belligerent people as possible.

Now come up those who suffered as enemies, and whose property was taken as enemies' property in a twofold sense—first, being, as is alleged in this report, the property of an open, avowed enemy; and second, as being taken in the custody of the depository of the confederate government, the Louisiana State Bank, which held and controlled the funds of the confederate government there. Why was not the question I propounded before when I spoke on this subject answered by some one? Was not the Louisiana State Bank the depository of the moneys of the confederate government? Was it not the financial agent of that government in New Orleans? Did it not hold its money and transact its business? Was not this very money a forced loan to that government while in the bank, and then, as far as there could be any legal control of it, under the legal control and disposition of the confederate government? No one answers this. All the answer there is to this is that some time after the city was captured, some time after the Federal troops had possession of the city and full control there, this Grivot came forward under a necessity and under a power he could not control and for his own purposes came in and took the oath of allegiance to receive the benefit of a political amnesty, not to settle the rights of the confederate government in property or the rights of the General Government to his property or the property of the bank. It all turns on that little point in this report which says that having received the benefit of the amnesty (which means nothing more than that for his own safety and for his own interest he came forward and declared his allegiance to the Government against which he had been contending), that covers, like the mantle of charity, a multitude of sins, and that hides from the vision of Senators not only the disloyalty of the past but hides all defenses which this Government could set up against a claim for the restoration of this money.

These are very serious questions. I tell you, Mr. President, that when it is once understood by the people of these United States that the precedent can be set in these little trivial bills by which this Government shall be made to pay back either to the individuals or their heirs all that vast amount of property destroyed, damaged, taken, used, put in the Treasury, put in the quartermasters' hands, and used for the Army—whenever the people of this nation see (and I hope they will examine this question and examine this report and see what it means), then they will call upon us to rebut such presumptions as this involves. Then when the pressure comes on the American people to raise taxes to repair all that infinite damage and loss to individuals and communities by the war, such bills as this will not pass with only my slight opposition, but every man here will be called upon by the people of the United States to reverse such a precedent and reverse such a decision. If the precedent be set, we shall be called upon to pass laws that will protect the Treasury of the United States from this kind of semi-judicial plunder and will protect the people of the United States from the immense and overwhelming taxation that must follow the continuing to settle these claims upon the precedent which this bill will establish.

Sir, I know that I am speaking in the face of a report of a committee which for its own sake and its own honor will be defended here. The principles upon which this report is made will be defended here. I do not expect to stop the passage of this bill. The most I expect to do is to call attention to the subject, to the principle upon which the bill is proposed to be passed, to the precedent which is about to be established, ay, which has been established heretofore and is referred to in many cases of like kind as the decision of Congress upon the subject of these old war claims. But, sir, having said these few words on this subject, I hope to have a record of the views of Senators by a yea and nay vote upon this class of cases, so that if this is to be used as a precedent in the future and shall be shown to be dangerous it may be seen that it did not pass without contest and that it did not pass without protest.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for only a few moments, while I notice some of the errors into which the Senator from Michigan has fallen.

This claim, Maurice Grivot having been amnestied and granted a pardon, stands precisely on the same footing as the claim of Franklin, administrator of Armfield, which was passed by the Senate a few days ago, and passed with the approval of the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Michigan was a member of the Committee on Claims when this report was first made, was present when it was considered, and did not then himself point out the dangers that he thinks now are involved in this allowance.

Further, Mr. President, he labors under a very serious misapprehension in regard to the facts. There is nothing in the papers showing, there is nothing to warrant the supposition in which he indulges, that this fund was held on account of the confederacy in that bank. It stood to the credit of Grivot. He brought his bill, as originally presented to the Senate, for $1,795, made up of the confederate money that was to his credit as well as of the fund that had been confiscated, growing out of the confiscation proceedings in relation to his personal furniture. All that was disallowed by the committee. We awarded him simply that fund of $962 which the Government took possession of under the express order of the commanding officer, "subject to the future adjudication of the United States." There has been no adjudication; but before making any adjudication the United States granted him amnesty and restored him to his full rights; they pardoned him and removed the only ground on which they could proceed to subject his property to confiscation and divest him of the title.

That is the whole case, and it is precisely like the Armfield case passed by the Senate a few days ago. In this we follow the decision of the Supreme Court in various cases; we follow the decision of the Supreme Court and of the Court of Claims, construing the act of July 2, 1864, which extended the provisions of the captured-and-abandoned-property act to the seizures made under the acts of 1861 and 1862.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, if the points I have made are good, it is no answer that I was or was not present, or that I was or was not a member of the Committee on Claims, or that I did hear or did not hear this report read in committee. I do not know the object of saying that. I will venture to say that the Senator from Tennessee, when I have been present in the Committee on Claims and any of these claims came up, has never known me to assent to the recommendation of the passage of a claim to which I ascribed the views I have of this. I have no recollection now of this claim among the hundreds that came before the committee when I was a member. It was referred to a subcommittee of which I was not one. I will venture to say that the gentleman will not assert that I was one of the subcommittee to whom the claim was referred.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no; by no means.

Mr. CONGER. Or that I in any way approved the principle, for I submit to the gentleman that continually I have opposed the class of claims that I consider this to belong to; and the charge of any inconsistency, although it may be deserved, even if it be deserved, is my misfortune. I do not know that it, if true, would prevent me expressing what are now my views. This report is the report of an old committee, adopted because it has been examined once; adopted, I suppose, by the new committee; I do not know; I do not inquire into the mode of these proceedings. I take the principle of this bill; I ask for the reasons that are given for its passage. If they are good and sound, no matter who presents it, whether it is one whose opinion ought, I think, to have weight, or whether it is one who speaks against the wind—if the opinions are true, the Senator can not ignore them because of the gentleman who presents them. The personality of this question is immaterial to me. I err as other men do. Bills pass perhaps to which I should give attention that I do not give attention to; but if there be one thing for the long years I have served in Congress which I have tried to watch and guard against carefully in this body and in the other it has been to prevent the introduction and passage of these bills which are used as precedents, as wedges to open the subject, and I think this is one. I think the place where it is asserted in this report that taking an oath of allegiance, a compulsory oath, for one reason or another, not only restores a citizen to all rights but divests him of all that he may have done wrong in regard to property seized before that oath of allegiance was sworn is a misconstruction of the law. I think that in this case the decision of the Supreme Court which is quoted in the report does not apply at all. If that be the law, if claims of this kind are to come here, if the decision of the Supreme Court covers all that class of cases of war claims and war losses and war damages, I tell Senators the time is coming soon when Congress will have something to do to make a law which shall overrule that decision of the Supreme Court—I do not say shall overrule the decision by legislation, but shall take away its applicability to this class of cases; for I do not believe and can not believe that the representatives of the people of the United States will dare follow out to its legitimate results the principle of this bill. I may be mistaken in regard to it, but as I view it it opens the way for the payment of all kinds of claims for all kinds of property taken and used during the war from those who were in hostility to this Government. If that be it, then, decision of the Supreme Court or no decision, Congress will be called upon in a voice that they must understand to pass some law which shall stop the ruin, the wrong, the taxation, the burdens which will overwhelm the American people and make those who sacrificed so much of life and health and blood and treasure to save this Government regret that it was saved at all.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator who reported this bill why it is that Grivot could not have brought a suit in the Court of Claims during his lifetime to recover this amount, or whether he had not some tribunal in some of the commissions which have been established for adjudicating Southern claims to which he might have appealed?

Mr. JACKSON. My recollection is that he died in 1867 or 1868.

Mr. PLATT. Then his administrator or executor could have taken his place if he had a right of action.

Mr. JACKSON. He had a right of action until August, 1868, in the Court of Claims.

Mr PLATT. I confess, Mr. President, that I do not see from anything in the report why these heirs, if this is a valid and legal claim against the Government of the United States, have not had an opportunity to pursue their remedy in the Court of Claims; and if they have failed to do so, I think it becomes a question of policy whether we are now to remove in this case the bar of the statute of limitations. We refuse to remove it in many cases, but I should like that point to be made clear, if any Senator can make it clear.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, Maurice Grivot was a registered enemy of the United States. Whether he was in the military or naval service of the confederacy does not appear, but that he was an open and avowed rebel is not denied. He confessed it by asking, after the war was closed and before the termination of his life, for amnesty, which it appears by the report was granted, although the date is not given. After the seizure of this money in the Louisiana State Bank at New Orleans proceedings were commenced against him to forfeit the right, title, interest, and estate which he had in and to household effects then and there being in the State of Louisiana. Those proceedings were prosecuted to a successful result. His effects were sold because he was a rebel, because he was an enemy of the United States, because he was engaged either in the military, naval, or civil service of the confederacy, and the sum of $220.34 was paid into the Treasury of the United States and there it remains to-day; and no heir of Maurice Grivot, no personal representative of Maurice Grivot, has ever had the hardihood to appear and claim that those proceedings were null and void or should be revoked. Their justice was recognized by the claimant and by his heirs. There never was any denial that he was an enemy of the United States Government and that when this money was seized he was in the employ in some capacity of the confederate government.

I should like to know some reason or hear some statement from the committee upon what ground it is, if this avowed enemy of the United States is entitled to have this money that was seized refunded to him, why he is not entitled to be made whole, why his estate should not be refunded the entire amount that was taken from him because he was a rebel.

There is a very attenuated, very fine-spun, and very nicely regulated argument here in this report to show that in consequence of the amnesty of the applicant in whose behalf the heirs now make this claim long after this seizure was made, long after his right to this property had been forfeited, admitted to be forfeited, recognized as forfeited by him and by all persons entitled to claim under him, there was some mysterious relation backward by which in consequence of the pardon granted to him just before his death his heirs, twenty years after the war closed, more than twenty years after this property was seized, after it has remained in the undisputed possession of the Government of the United States, are now entitled to come in and claim that it shall be refunded.

Mr. President, the note of alarm that has been sounded by the Senator from Michigan is well made. This is a test case; and if upon such a claim as that set forth in this report where there was amnesty made long after the act of forfeiture had occurred, after the man's property had been confiscated by a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction—proceedings that were admitted to be regular, whose authority never was denied—if Congress is to be asked to open the doors of the Treasury to claims like this, then we shall need, instead of reducing our revenues, to increase them to pay the claims that may come up under this precedent.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Kansas I think misapprehends this case. At the time this money was seized there stood to the credit of Grivot on the books of the bank the sum of $1,574.79. Of this sum $611.94 was received in confederate notes. It does not appear that the confederate funds were of any value at that time in fact or that they were utilized by the Government of the United States. Consequently the committee disallowed that amount entirely.

Mr. INGALLS. That is so much.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes; that is so much. There is another amount, two hundred and some odd dollars, which was realized from the sale of Grivot's household furniture. Proceedings were commenced in one of the courts for the purpose of confiscating the furniture of Grivot. Those proceedings were prosecuted to final judgment, not against this money, but against his household furniture.

Mr. INGALLS. Because he was a rebel.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well; because he was a rebel. I say that the proceedings for confiscation of his household furniture were prosecuted to final judgment, and upon the decree rendered in that case his household furniture was sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury of the United States. Now, the committee——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Those proceedings were after the seizure of this money in bank.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is immaterial for the purposes of this case whether it was after or before.

Mr. INGALLS. It shows the situation at the time the money was seized.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is admitted that at the time the money was seized he was an enemy of the United States. No one denies that. I say the committee assumed that the proceedings in the confiscation case against the household furniture of Grivot were regular, that judgment not having been appealed from or reversed, and consequently the committee disallow the claim for that. The other amount was the sum of $962.85 in par or current funds. That was seized at the same time that the confederate funds were seized and turned over to the officer who was authorized by the commanding general to receive it. No proceedings whatever for the confiscation of this sum of nine hundred and odd dollars were ever commenced against Grivot or against this money. The committee were of the opinion that the title to this money did not pass from Grivot to the United States at the moment when it was seized under the order of General Banks, which the Supreme Court subsequently held was a void order.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him in that connection that it was ordered to be held subject to future adjudication.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was just coming to that. As the Senator from Tennessee, who made this report and who is more familiar with the case than I am, states, it was seized to be held subject to the further adjudication of the United States. If the United States had chosen to go on and by judicial proceedings confiscate this money, the heirs of Grivot would have no claim to it now; but instead of doing that the United States pardoned Grivot. After he was pardoned the United States could not have proceeded to confiscate. It is very similar to the cotton that was seized under the captured-and-abandoned-property act, sold by virtue of a law of the United States, and the proceeds covered into the Treasury. The owners of that cotton, within the time limited by the act, no matter whether they were loyal or disloyal, no matter whether they ever had been pardoned or not, could have commenced actions in the courts of the United States and recovered the value of that cotton. So here, this money was seized under the void order of General Banks; it was seized by the terms of the order to be held subject to further proceedings upon the part of the United States. No such proceedings were ever had. Consequently the title to this money remained in Grivot and is now in his heirs.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the decision of the Supreme Court on which the committee have based their report recognize the right of the commanding general in New Orleans to have seized this property for the use of the Army?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not see that that question is involved in this case.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is directly involved.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think not.

Mr. HARRISON. Because if he had the right to seize it for that use, then I would question the Senator's construction of the terms in which it was seized and the purpose for which it was seized.

Mr. JACKSON. The Supreme Court decision expressly holds that this seizure was made to enforce the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862, and that the order of General Banks, No. 202, making the seizure was invalid and void, and that he had no authority to execute the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator will see if he reads it that they did recognize his right as commanding officer there to seize that for the present use of the troops there, if he had pleased.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, and to have it held subject to the adjudication of the United States in confiscation proceedings, if the Government wished to confiscate it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand that that language means that it was held subject to proceedings for condemnation in court, but to subsequent adjudication or disposition, any that might be made by the Government, whether by judicial decree or by legislative act.

Mr. JACKSON. The Supreme Court expressly decided that the seizure made under that order No. 202 was not made for military purposes and to meet military necessities, but that it was an attempt to enforce the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862, and therefore void.

Mr. MILLER, of California. In point of fact what became of the money?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It went into the Treasury of the United States; is there now. In substance it was used by the military authorities for the purpose of supplying the troops and was accounted for to the Government.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It was used to pay debts of the Army?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It was used for Army purposes.

Mr. MILLER, of California, To pay troops, supplies, &c.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I presume so.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Does it appear as a fact that that disposition was made of the money by General Banks?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It does appear that it was used by the Quartermaster's Department and accounted for to the United States as money seized in the way that has been stated.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The ground of the decision of the committee is that it was seized by an order of General Banks which was a void order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. So the Supreme Court has held.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The ground is that the seizure was illegal and the title never passed from Grivot to the Government.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; the committee so found, that the title never passed, and consequently the heirs have a right to recover the money. The distinction is made between this and the money that was realized from confiscation proceedings against the furniture of Grivot; and the confederate money, which was of no use to the United States, is entirely excluded from consideration.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Claims I wish to state the grounds on which I gave my vote in favor of this bill.

It seems that the personal property was condemned under the confiscation act, and of course that property does not come under the decision of the United States Supreme Court; but it does appear by the decision of the court that this fund which we propose to return, the $900 and over, did come into the national Treasury, and that the General Government had the benefit of the money. It is in the national Treasury as a trust fund; it belongs to Grivot; it is there in trust; and my idea was that we should not apply the statute of limitations as against the cestuis que trust.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether in point of fact this money ever did go into the Treasury?

Mr. PIKE. I understand it so.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The chairman of the committee does not understand it so.

Mr. PIKE. Substantially it comes to that; it was used by the United States. I do not know that these exact dollars were paid into the United States Treasury, but they were used by the General Government and went to its benefit.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Used by the Quartermaster's Department in New Orleans, and accounted for by the quartermaster to the Treasury.

Mr. CONGER. Was it not used just as beef or pork or flour or any other thing that was taken for the use of the Army, for the food of the soldiers? Does not exactly the same rule apply?

Mr. PIKE. I do not understand that it makes any difference whether money is paid to buy beef of me or whether the money is paid to me and I buy the beef. I do not understand that there is any distinction. I understand that this money went to the benefit of the United States, which is equivalent to saying it went into its Treasury. It holds it in trust, and the question before the committee was whether we should keep it from the cestuis que trust.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to have the Senator from New Hampshire or some member of the committee answer this question: Has not the United States stretched a bar across these cestui que trust claims, and whether we shall remove that bar or not depends on the question whether the cestui que trust is free from fault—not legal fault, but actual fault? If there is any reason why the bar of the statute of limitations should be removed, such a reason as will form a safe precedent, I am willing to remove it; but I am not willing to remove it when he stands confessedly in actual fault, whatever the law may say about it. Then I ask, besides, whether there is any good reason why he did not assert himself before the statute took effect?

Mr. PIKE. I would say, so far as my knowledge of the case goes, that all the committee considered this question, and they considered all the facts in the case bearing on the question whether or not the statute of limitations should apply as against these heirs, and we were satisfied that under the circumstances it ought not; that there was good reason why they did not apply in time.

Mr. DAWES. The report is absolutely silent, so far as I have been able to discover, upon that question. The report does not suggest any reason why we should take notice of the existence of the statute of limitations. It proceeds upon the theory that the United States has provided this remedy for all time. We put a statute of limitations across all honest claims, claims that have no taint of fraud of any kind in their origin, and the claimants sometimes come here and show good reasons in equity why we should relieve them from the statutes of limitations. But here a claimant comes, standing confessedly in the wrong, and his claim grows out of the wrong, but the law is such that if he proceeds within two years in the Court of Claims to recover this money he can recover it.

Now, if there is in equity and fair dealing any good reason that can be put upon the record why this statute of limitations should be removed from him, I am willing to vote for the claim; but it ought to have gone into the report and it ought to have been made so prominent in the report that it would have been relieved from any precedent, any conception in the mind of people situated like these individuals that the United States has declared that as to all claims growing out of the war no statute of limitations stood between them and the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PIKE. One word more. Since I have been a member of this committee, which is but a little while, I believe we have reported hardly one, if one, case where the statute of limitations would not have applied; and further than this, we have passed very many bills removing the bar of the statute of limitations and permitting the case to be heard in the Court of Claims, of course for reasons satisfactory to the committee. There were, as I have said, reasons satisfactory to the committee why we should not interpose this bar now, but give back this money, which we understood, under the decision of the United States Supreme Court, belongs to these cestuis que trust. I am sorry those reasons are not in the report, if the fact be that they are not there stated.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not understand that there ever was a remedy in the Court of Claims or anywhere else for this claim, and the statement of any Senator on the floor of the Senate that there was has been inadvertent. Money has no earmark. This does not grow out of a contract, express or implied, with the United States, which is the only case where there is a remedy in the Court of Claims. This was a deposit in a bank, which was seized by an order of General Banks, which the Supreme Court of the United States, in a suit pending between two parties in the New Orleans circuit and coming up from the circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court, held was totally void. By that order this money which this man had deposited, if I have the facts in my recollection, was put into the Treasury. There it is now, to be held either to the use of the United States if they have the rightful use of it or to the use of the parties equitably entitled if the proceeding was wrong. There never being a remedy at any time in the Court of Claims or anywhere else except by application to Congress, of course no statute of limitations ever barred a remedy. This is not a question of removing the bar of the statute of limitations.

My colleague raises another question for answer, which is whether the fault of the party whose property this was does not mingle itself with the transaction, so that we ought not after the lapse of so long a period of time, whether there is a statutory bar or not, to interfere for his redress. The facts in regard to that, which I think will fully satisfy my colleague and the Senate, are these: This person was, it is true, a disloyal citizen. It does not appear that he ever did any act of disloyalty, but he was not a Union man in the common sense of the term. He got his amnesty soon after this money was seized and died just after receiving the amnesty, leaving minor children. They grew up, and when they came of age, or very soon after, this application was made to Congress for their relief.

Now, although this man was in fault in being a rebel, his fault in being a rebel had no connection or relation to this transaction, because by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States it was not within the lawful authority of the commanding general to take his property under these circumstances and transfer it to the Treasury of the United States because he was a rebel, but all his legal rights remained unchanged, rebel or no rebel. The question is then whether, this money being in the Treasury and not belonging fairly and in justice to the United States, we will restore it to the heirs of a man who died, leaving minors, within a very brief time after he received amnesty and within a very brief time after the transaction?

Mr. DAWES. Could not the gurdian have applied?

Mr. HOAR. It is true the guardian might have applied in the mean time, but on the other hand it is also true——

Mr. FRYE. He could not have sued the United States.

Mr. HOAR. He might have applied here for relief, I should have said. But it is also true that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has been only recently promulgated. The Senator from Tennessee can state the date.

Mr. JACKSON. December, 1872.

Mr. INGALLS. Eleven years ago.

Mr. HOAR. Eleven years ago, it is true, but it was not promulgated until that time.

Mr. PIKE. The claim has been prosecuted for years.

Mr. HOAR. I do not remember the date when it was first presented. It has been here for years. The Senator from Tennessee perhaps can also state when the application was first made to Congress.

Mr. JONAS. It has been made for four years to my knowledge. I introduced the bill.

Mr. HOAR. But the conclusive answer on that point is that the express statutes of limitations exclude the period of minority, the claim accruing to a minor originally, from the operation of the statutes. I do not know whether the point which my colleague suggests was answered in the court or not.

Mr. DAWES. What I have asked for is that it may be dealt with. I do not understand that my colleague, with all due respect to him, has quite answered it here. I understand the Supreme Court to say that the order of General Banks as a military order was illegal, but the Supreme Court have not decided that General Banks as a military officer could not seize an enemy's property when he was attempting to hold his ground against an enemy, seize it entirely and capture it so that it became part of the "captured and abandoned property" independent of the statute. As I understand it and as I understand this Committee on Claims, it does not thereby become the property of the United States until proceedings in court have condemned it, and therefore it still remains the property of the individual, and the individual could after peace, under our statutes and the decisions of the Supreme Court, have gone into the Court of Claims and recovered that property under the captured-and-abandoned-property act, which provided a remedy. So I understand.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, not under that act.

Mr. HOAR. Not at all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That act did not apply.

Mr. DAWES. At any rate, in order to prevent the overwhelming of the Treasury with these claims a statute of limitations of two years applicable to this class of claims was passed. So I understand. The Senator from Wisconsin knows more about it than I do, but he has kept it all to himself, he has not put it into this report and he could not tell and never since he has been on the floor has he done so. He may have thought I ought to know it. I am one of fifty millions of people, and there are only a few of them here, and I want this committee now to put upon the record the reason why if this claim, old as it is, is not barred by any statute of limitations, what claim growing out of the proceedings of the war is barred?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator wants to be instructed I am perfectly willing to instruct him about that. He wants to know if this claim is not barred what claim is barred. Cotton claims are barred, because the act provided that the action must be brought within a certain time.

Mr. DAWES. What kind of action?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. For proceeds of cotton.

Mr. DAWES. And abandoned property.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But this was not abandoned property; it was not seized under that.

Mr. DAWES. It was not seized under that, but when seized it was held under that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, it was not held under that.

Mr. DAWES. It was not seized under it, but held under it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It could not be held under it unless seized under it.

Mr. DAWES. That is the trouble; it was held by the commanding general under the laws of war.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, it was not seized in that way.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to a condition of things that has not been mentioned here, it seems to me, and that is, that after General Butler captured New Orleans he issued an order, on the 1st day of May, 1862. Now, I will read what the Supreme Court say about that order:

A pledge, however, had been given that rights of property should be respected.

That also answers the proposition which was made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], that General Banks had a right to take this and appropriate it for the support of the Army.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator from Missouri certainly would not extend that proclamation so far as to deny all power to the investing military forces to seize property of rebels who had fled and left the city.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about the power of the Union Army to subsist on the rebels. As a matter of course they have no right to compensation; there is no question about that raised here at all. Here is the point I am making; I am not giving my views, I am giving the views of the Supreme Court; the Supreme Court say:

A pledge, however, had been given that rights of property should be respected. When the city was surrendered to the Army under General Butler a proclamation was issued, dated May 1, 1862, one clause of which was as follows: "All the rights of property of whatever kind will be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States." This, as was remarked in the case of the Venice (2 Wallace, 258) "only reiterated the rules established by the legislative and executive action of the National Government in respect to the portions of the States in insurrection occupied and controlled by the troops of the Union." That action, it was said, indicated the policy of the Government to be, not to regard districts occupied and controlled by national troops as in actual insurrection or their inhabitants as subject in most respects to treatment as enemies. Substantial, complete, and permanent military occupation and control was held to draw after it the full measure of protection to persons and property consistent with a necessary subjection to military government. We do not assert that anything in General Butler's proclamation exempted property within the occupied district from liability to confiscation as enemies' property, if in truth it was such. All that is now said is, that after that proclamation private property in the district was not subject to military seizure as booty of war.

"Was not subject to military seizure" for appropriation to Army purposes.

Mr. DAWES. I understand——

Mr. COCKRELL. One minute; I want to go on one moment further. Then, under this decision of the Supreme Court, this property within the limits of the military lines there in New Orleans was not liable to seizure for Army purposes and for the support of the Army. That is settled. The Senator from Massachusetts asked the Senator from Wisconsin what classes of claims were barred. This claim certainly did not come within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; there is no question about that in my mind, because the Court of Claims only has jurisdiction on a contract. The only question was as to whether it came within the jurisdiction of the Southern Claims Commission, or "the Commissioners of Claims," as they were in law. I am not entirely satisfied on that point myself as to whether the Commissioners of Claims had jurisdiction or not, for I have not examined that for some time.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator will remember that they only had jurisdiction of claims for quartermaster or commissary stores.

Mr. HOAR. Taken from loyal men.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right; I remember it now. I had forgotten the language. The Commissioners of Claims had no jurisdiction. There then was no tribunal that had jurisdiction in this matter.

Now, what claims are barred? I will say that all claims for quartermaster and commissary stores within the insurrectionary States are barred, because the Commissioners of Claims had jurisdiction, and they have passed upon them all, and all the committees of the Senate and House have refused to take up and consider those claims. Then I say, in addition to that, that the claims for captured and abandoned property are all barred. In fact I do not know of a solitary class of claims that could originate within the insurrectionary States that is not barred. If there is any I have not seen it. The Senator from Michigan need not be harrowed up about this matter.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has gone along with me, or rather I have gone along with him, to this point exactly. I do not differ with him in any position he has taken up to this point. He says he does not know any claim that is not barred. I agree with him there. I go further, and say that I am ready to remove the bar when there is any fair and just ground for it, and if there is in this case, very well; I am not hesitating because of the peculiar origin of the case.

Mr. COCKRELL. When I said "barred," I meant a claim where a remedy existed. You can not say that the limitation applies to a claim when the claimant never had any remedy which he had a right to assert in court.

As I understand this case, and I only gather it from the report, these minor children never have had a remedy, either in the Court of Claims or before the Commissioners of Claims, and nothing is barred. They had no remedy. Here is the money, and the only question now is whether Congress will permit them to take it out or not.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to a point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. The report shows that after the property had been taken Grivot and his heirs, as they naturally would and had a right to do, commenced suit against the bank which had received the deposit.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. There is where their remedy lay, and they so asserted. The courts of Louisiana decided that the military order of General Banks seizing the property relieved the bank from all responsibility. That settled the question in favor of the bank. Now, after the decision which said the order was legal and relieved the bank of responsibility, they turn about, Janus-faced, and say that the order was illegal, and did not relieve anybody from responsibility and did not even protect the Government of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was simply attempting to allay the fears of my good friend from Michigan.

As I understand this case, these parties after the war brought their suit against the bank in the State courts, and the State courts held properly that the order of the commanding general to take the funds and turn them over to the United States authorities released the bank from liability to its depositors.

Mr. HOAR. An act of overwhelming force.

Mr. COCKRELL. Overwhelming power and force. There is no question about the correctness of the decision, but that had nothing on earth to do with the right of these parties to come to the United States and ask to have the money returned to them.

I want to say to the Senator that he need not harrow up his mind by dreams of hob-goblins in regard to rebel claims; the country will never be troubled over them. A man who went into the rebellion 21 years old and of sound mind will not be apt to come to the Government of the United States and ask compensation for his property that was taken, used, or destroyed by the Union Army. Take a case in Missouri. I will take my colleague [Mr. VEST]. He was in the confederate army. In 1861 when Price's army marched through the State they came by his premises and they protected his property, and not a dollar of it was taken because he was in sympathy with that side. After a while Price is driven out of the State and a Union general comes along, and that Union general's force takes all his perishable property and appropriates it for the support of the army. But he had a Union neighbor, a man who was as strong on the other side as my colleague was on the rebel side. When Price's army came that army took all that that Union neighbor had, every particle of his property. Now, here are two neighbors living side by side. The Union neighbor has lost all his property by the depredations of the rebel army, and the rebel neighbor has lost all his property by the depredations of the Union army. The war is over. What remedy has that Union man? The forces that took his property are out of existence. They were only "so called" at best. There is no remedy for him. Do you think that my colleague, situated in that way, would come before the Congress of the United States and ask them to compensate him for his loss, and ask that his Union neighbor be taxed to make the compensation for him?

I know there is too much honor and self-respect in those who went into the rebellion ever to permit themselves to be placed in that position, and there is no danger of it. I do not know but that before this session is over I may be calling upon the distinguished Senator from Michigan to aid me in preventing the payment of claims of quasi-loyal people, a great many of whom could have proved their loyalty just as well to the confederacy if it had succeeded as they are able to prove it now to the United States Government. No, Mr. President; there is no danger to the Treasury of this country from the hands of the rebels for the payment of alleged rebel claims.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, it is a consoling thought to believe that the statement of the Senator from Missouri is the general sentiment of those who have these innumerable claims. His illustration is not exactly a good one, for neither my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who in the imagination of his colleague suffered so much, would bring such a claim here, as good a lawyer as he is, nor any other Senator that I know of. But notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that no man who was in the rebel service would dream of presenting such a claim to Congress, I call his attention to the fact that for the last fifteen years that exquisite sensitive conscience of those Southern men has been asleep in some way or they have been doing things that they did not dream of. They have been presenting claims that they did not know about or they have had attorneys engaged in presenting such claims to Congress.

Sir, there are cords of claims (I mean to speak of them by number) in both Houses of Congress of just the character the gentleman says these Southern men would not present, great cupboards full of them, numbered by thousands, numbered by tens of thousands, involving in the substance of the claims money by thousands, by hundreds of thousands, by millions, by hundred of millions, got in here against the will of these gentlemen, who never would dream of presenting a claim, forced in here in spite of the views and feeling represented by the Senator from Missouri, who says that no Southern man would bring here a claim for the damages and losses and injuries which he had sustained! I say the records of Congress show that there have been thousands of exactly such claims pending, the files and records show it, great broadsides of rooms filled with that class of claims and with the vouchers.

The picture drawn by the Senator from Missouri is a pleasant one, and yet that gentleman and his friends in the South have sounding in their ears an eternal trumpet for these claims. Like Count Robert of Paris from year to year they have an eternal trumpet sounding in their ears for the enforcement of these claims as fast and as far as Congress will open the way and permit an entering-wedge to them. It is this entering-wedge that I fear.

I have said all I desire. When the gentleman goes further than I do in resisting any improper claim here, then, as he is taller than I am, he may rise and look down upon me.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JACKSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. MAXEY. It is 5 o'clock now.

Mr. JACKSON. I hope he will withdraw it. ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MAXEY. Very well.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I hope the members of the Committee on Claims will be able to adjust their differences of opinion among themselves. "When doctors disagree who shall decide?" One member of the committee said that Maurice Grivot had his remedy before his death and his heirs afterward. Another member of the committee denies it. One member assures us that the money of Maurice Grivot went into the Treasury of the United States. Another says no, it went into the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army and was spent for the subsistence of the armies of the United States. If we had the facts in this case before us we should be able to act more intelligently, and it is a little singular that after two committees have reported upon this measure there should still be left so much doubt as to the substratum upon which it rests.

The Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, assures us that if this money had been confiscated, that if the Government had seen fit to enforce the proceedings in confiscation against it, there would have been no question about the want of right on the part of Grivot to recover. Does the Senator from Wisconsin not know that proceedings in confiscation are in rem; that they are against the thing that is taken or seized; and that when this money was put in the quartermaster's chest and paid out for the current expenses of the Army, confiscation proceedings could not be had? Why does he then assume here to urge as one reason why the bill should pass that confiscation proceedings were not had against this money? That is a subterfuge, speaking legally. No one ought to know better than the Senator that the confiscation proceedings could not be had, and no one knows better than he that when this money was taken possession of by General Banks under that military order, Maurice Grivot being a rebel, a registered enemy of the United States, in open hostility against it, his goods and chattels, real estate and money, by the law of nations and by the law of war, were forfeit to the Government to which he owed allegiance and which allegiance he had broken. Yet, sir, twenty years after the right of action had expired, and no effort had been made by anybody to reclaim this money, no one had had the hardihood to assert that there was any right to reclaim it—for I have examined the files, and prior to 1880 no one ever asserted the right to recover this property—we are gravely told by the Committee on Claims that because the Government did not see fit to enforce confiscation proceedings against money that had been taken by a general of the Army of the United States and put into the quartermaster's chest and spent for beef and pork and flour for subsistence, therefore the right of action exists and Congress ought to be called upon to pay this money.

Mr. President, I move to indefinitely postpone the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Kansas moves to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kansas in his quite impassioned appeal erred in two very serious and essential particulars, one a matter of law and the other a matter of fact.

It is not true as a matter of law that the property of a rebel or other enemy is forfeited, goods, chattels, and money, to the government to which he has failed to render the allegiance which is his due as a citizen. On the contrary it is true that governments by the laws of war have the right to exact that extreme penalty; but the question whether in any particular war it is exacted depends upon the legislative power of the country, or that failing to act, upon the power in command of its armies. The Supreme Court of the United States have expressly and repeatedly held that both the acts of Congress and the policy declared by President Lincoln negatived the election of that supreme right, and that the private property of citizens in rebellion was not confiscated or forfeited except in certain particular cases expressly provided for by law, of which this is not one.

There is the first grave error of the Senator from Kansas. The next is in supposing that this money had been put into the Quartermaster's Department and spent, as he says, for beef or otherwise. The money was, as is found in the report of the committee, paid over to the quartermaster and held by him to be accounted for to the Treasury of the United States according to future direction, and at the end of the war it went into the Treasury.

Therefore, the case is just this: General Banks, in violation of the proclamation by which the Government of the United States had pledged its faith to the citizens of that insurgent district that as a condition of their future submission to the authority of the United States their private property should be respected, made a certain order which the Supreme Court of the United States declares is illegal, to wit, that a bank which was a private debtor to Grivot should pay over the amount of that debt to the quartermaster, to be held subject to the future order of the Government, which was received and held and paid over by him into the Treasury when his accounts were settled. That was a violation of the public faith of the United States and something entirely beyond the lawful authority of that commander, and the Supreme Court of the United States have held that the property of that citizen remained unchanged and undivested, and there is in the Treasury of the United States at this moment a sum of money which by the decision of the Supreme Court is his, or now his heirs' and legal representatives'. That is the case. Why should it not be paid to the children of the man who owned it and who now own it themselves?

One suggestion is that before this decision of the United States Supreme Court was made there was a decision of the State court to the effect that the overwhelming force of the order of the commanding general, which that bank obeyed, compelling it to pay over the money to the United States instead of to the depositor, excused it as a matter of law from any further obligation to him. But that does not go on a ground in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and if it did, of course the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States would be the binding authority, binding upon us and binding upon all mankind.

The next matter is the failure of these parties to resort to their remedy. The answer to that is that the man died, and that down to three or four years ago, in 1880, the decision of the Supreme Court having been promulgated for the first time in 1872, they neglected to come to Congress. That is a fair suggestion. Of course there is no bar. There never was any remedy anywhere before any tribunal against which we are to remove a bar. We provided a remedy for loyal persons whose property was taken for army supplies. We provided certain other remedies. We provided a remedy in the Court of Claims where there was an express or implied contract. But there was no remedy here. Courts of equity to which the statute of limitations does not apply have a corresponding rule by which they exclude stale claims, and it is a fair question in this case for our consideration whether Congress would not apply the same rule. But the committee think unanimously, and have twice thought unanimously, that where so doubtful a question was decided by the Supreme Court for the first time in 1872, and where for a considerable period of this time these persons were minors, against whom ordinary statutes of limitation never run, it was not fair, the right being clear, to interpose to them the objection "You did not bring your case in season." It is not a case where the testimony of witnesses might change the result, where we are going as to values or amounts or facts into matters where we rest a claim upon the evidence of witnesses, where witnesses who might contradict them are lost to the Government; but it is a case where the right is clear and all stands proved and established on the public records of the Government itself. Therefore we are not removing a bar. It is not a case where we should create, by our refusal to hear the cry of these injured parties, a bar when there is no reason in justice or in equity which requires us to do it.

Mr. LAPHAM. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to what is stated on the first page of the report. After describing the funds which were paid over, part confederate and part lawful money, the report states:

> The United States authorities do not appear to have made any use of the confederate funds. The par funds ($962.85), with like funds received under said General Order No. 202 from other banks, amounting in the aggregate to $44,692.43, were taken up in August, 1863, and expended by the quartermaster for the ordinary purposes of the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator read what follows?

Mr. LAPHAM. I read what shows the use made of the money.

Mr. HOAR. But that language is qualified by what follows. The bills or cash of course had no earmark any more than the money deposited in the bank in the first instance.

> And the chief quartermaster, in his order designating Captain McClure, acting quartermaster, as the officer to receive said funds, directed him to "hold this money and account for it to the United States Treasury."

When the quartermaster came to settle up his accounts at the end of the war he accounted for so much that he expended, so much paid over. You can not suppose that this particular sum of money was expended in any particular way, but the balance, as it ought to be, was stated.

Mr. LAPHAM. Let me ask the Senator, suppose instead of $900 in money it had been $900 worth of beef, and that had been used for the Quartermaster's Department, what is the difference in the two cases

Mr. HOAR. That had the earmark on it.

Mr. DAWES. The bank did not pay over the identical money.

Mr. HOAR. The bank did not pay over the identical money. This bank, as I understand, kept a class of accounts as deposits in gold or silver in specie, another class of deposits in confederate notes, and another class in United States notes, and they paid back to the depositor on his check or draft the kind of funds which he had deposited, but not, of course, the particular bill or coin. In the same way when the bank paid over this money to the United States quartermaster it paid over to him a sum of money which is a credit to the bank as having received so much. Then the quartermaster goes on and keeps his account of what he has received from any source, what he has a lawful right to expend, and what he has left he pays over to the United States Government; but this order of a superior fixes the character of his holding the money, and he could not lawfully and properly expend it for the supply of the Army. He was to hold this money and account for it to the United States Treasury.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask my colleague whether this was a special deposit by this man in the bank, which deposit General Banks compelled the bank to deliver over, or was the bank indebted to this man a certain sum of money because he had given them that money, and did not General Banks's order compel the bank to pay an equivalent sum of money?

Mr. HOAR. I stated that it paid the kind of currency it received.

Mr. DAWES. Exactly. Then when this man brought his suit against the bank for his debt the bank set up a defense which the courts of Louisiana decided to be legal, that is to say, the bank had a good defense to the debt which they owed him; and that judgment ought to be respected so far as the law is concerned everywhere, and have the same force and effect in any other State or jurisdiction that it had in that jurisdiction.

So then it turns out as a legal proposition that General Banks did not take the property of this claimant from that bank, but compelled the bank to pay him a certain amount of money which was measured by what the bank owed this man. They did not take his property; they undertook to confiscate the credit, and that the courts of Louisiana declared was a good defense against this man, that it was a legal proceeding, and having gone into a court of competent jurisdiction as between him and the bank and failed in that court, he comes here and says he will not be bound by the judgment of that court, and will require the United States to pay him the debt which the bank owed him.

Mr. HOAR. Let me put that case to my colleague and see where he will land. Suppose that was the exact legal aspect of this case—and I am not sure that it is; I will not undertake to deny it for any purpose of this debate. Suppose General Banks had ordered that money to be paid over to my colleague, and he has got it in his pocket at this moment, instead of paying it to the United States. The trustee who held the money had been compelled by this overwhelming military power to pay him, and the court had held that so far as another claim against the trustee was concerned my remedy was gone, I being the person who deposited the money in trust, and the Supreme Court of the United States had held that I had no right to hold it for any other purpose, would he refuse to pay me back? This is a question not of technical remedy, it is a question of right, and if it would disgrace an honest man to keep the money in his own pockets under such circumstances, even if my colleague were right, does he think the Government ought to retain it?

Mr. DAWES. My colleague says that these parties never had any remedy anywhere. If this property was the property of this claimant and had been paid over to me and I was holding it without right, I should infer that I was holding it under an implied contract to pay it over to the cestui que trust. If I was the Government of the United States holding it under an implied contract he could walk into the Court of Claims any minute, and therefore he had his remedy in the Court of Claims from the day it was done till this day, and the statute of limitations, which has been the trouble with me from the beginning, comes right up to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Let us have a vote. We have got through the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be indefinitely postponed?

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CONGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT.] I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I do not see the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his seat. I arranged with him half an hour since to pair with me on Monday on political questions. I do not know how the Senator would vote, but if he does not make his appearance I shall withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if the Senator from Ohio were present.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is not here. I am paired generally with him. I do not consider this a political question. I shall refrain from voting, however.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. My pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is really intended to apply to Monday only, but I should reserve my vote if I regarded this as a political question. My pair with him was upon political questions only; and not regarding this as a political question, I will record my vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM. Since the roll has been called, and especially after the remark made by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], as this is manifestly not a partisan question, I will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 9; as follows:

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chairs hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments. I will state that the minority of the committee desire the privilege, at a time which will suit their convenience, of submitting an adverse report. I will say also that the majority of the committee desire the privilege of filing written reasons for their report at a subsequent period before the bill is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, and leave will be given to make the reports as suggested, if there be no objection.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

COLORADO SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to donate public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," be taken from the Speaker's table and put on its passage at this time. It has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands and has already passed the Senate twice.

Mr. BUDD. I object.

Mr. BELFORD. Then I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, this being Friday.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman yields to me to submit a resolution which is a mere formal matter.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes; I will withhold my demand for the regular order and yield the floor to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado must either withdraw or insist on his demand unconditionally. He can not take the floor and yield to one gentleman and refuse to yield to another.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw the demand unconditionally then.

CLERK OF CENSUS COMMITTEE.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Select Committee to Ascertain the Results of the Tenth Census, authorized by resolution of February 8, 1884, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate of compensation, namely, $6 per day, as that now paid to committee clerks of the present Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Ought not that to go to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. COX, of New York. No; the resolution has already passed, and this only supplies an omission by fixing the amount of pay.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BAYNE. I call for the regular order.

GENERAL ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls for the regular order, which is the unfinished business of Friday last, being the bill (H. R. 1101) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general. The pending question was upon the passage of the bill, and upon that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] had demanded the previous question. Pending that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] moved to recommit the bill with certain instructions. Upon that motion a question of order was made. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana on the point of order if he desires to be heard.

Mr. STEELE. On the point of order I desire to have a portion of the report of the committee read. I should like very much for the House to give attention to this very able argument.

The Clerk read as follows:

It will be remembered that some hours before, General Sickles, with two divisions of his corps, had been ordered to advance for the purpose of operating against the column of the enemy under Jackson. The giving way of the right left General Sickles in a very exposed and critical position; but upon being informed of the condition of affairs he at once took measures to withdraw his force, which was successfully done, and without much loss. The enemy, under Jackson, continued to advance after the panic-stricken troops until checked by General Pleasonton, who had collected and brought into position some artillery for that purpose. Although a cavalry officer, he handled the artillery with exceeding great judgment and effectiveness. His skill, energy, daring, and promptness upon this occasion contributed greatly to arrest the disaster which for a time threatened the whole army. His conduct upon this and many other occasions marks him as one of the ablest generals in our service, and as deserving of far higher consideration than, from some cause, he appears to have received.

Mr. STEELE. I have had that read to show what the report says, among other things, about the gallantry of this officer; and I wish to make the remark that that portion of the report is not founded upon facts, as I am informed by a distinguished gentleman on this floor, and who is and was quite as gallant as General Pleasonton himself. He states that he was present and knows that the artillery was placed in position by another officer, and not by General Pleasonton.

Mr. BAYNE. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. He is not speaking at all upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order, which is that the resolution of instructions proposed by him is not in order, as, if carried out, it would convert the pending bill from a private bill into a public bill.

Mr. STEELE. I do not propose to be captious about this matter at all. I only want to state that it seems to me eminently proper to put on the retired-list men who are now helpless, who are blind, or without arms, or without legs, if you can take a man from civil life suffering from no disability, a bachelor and able to take care of himself, and put him on the retired-list. If you can put a man in that condition on the retired-list, it seems to me eminently proper and right that the class of men named in my proposition should also be put on the retired-list.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken. The effect of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] if adopted would be to do indirectly, under a motion to recommit with instructions, what could not be done directly on the floor of the House; that is to say, to convert into a public bill this private bill for the benefit of General Pleasonton. The Chair therefore rules the proposition out of order.

Mr. STEELE. Would it be in order to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs without instructions?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. STEELE. Then I make that motion.

The question was taken upon the motion to recommit; and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 60.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BAYNE called for tellers.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are called for. No quorum having voted, tellers will be ordered.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BAYNE and Mr. STEELE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 91, noes 86.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report ayes 91, noes 86. The ayes have it, and the motion to recommit is agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I want the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. VALENTINE. You are too late.

Mr. BAYNE. Hardly; you want to go on the record.

Mr. McMILLIN. The demand for the yeas and nays is too late. The Chair has announced the result of the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] the benefit of submitting to the House his demand for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 41 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Chair to restate the question. I think some members have voted under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], to recommit the pending bill to the Committee on Military Affairs without instructions; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 122, nays 114, not voting 84; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive; and

A bill (S. 399) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

JOHN B. MONTEITH, DECEASED.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in the settlement of the Indian accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, late Indian agent at the Lapwai Indian agency, in the Territory of Idaho, for the Nez Percé Indians, to allow him, or the administrator or executor of his estate, the sum of $875.75, which amount has been heretofore disallowed him in the settlement of his accounts in the Indian service; and which sum for that purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that, in consequence of one of the present rules of the House providing that these reports be sent to the rooms of the members instead of being placed in the document-room, a printed report, when actually required here for use, can not in many cases be obtained. As I have not been able to get this report from the document-room, I must, for that reason only, call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, have had the same under consideration and report thereon as follows:

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in the adjustment of the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, late Indian agent at the Lapwai Indian agency in Idaho for the Nez Percé Indians, to allow the administrator of his estate the sum of $875.75, as follows, to wit:

To fees paid J. M. Howe, attorney for Government employés, as per itemized statement	$440 00
To rent paid W. G. Langford, in the names of the various employés, by Agent Monteith, as per itemized statement	152 00
To justice fees paid, as per itemized statement	33 75
To amounts disallowed in the final settlement of late Indian Agent John B. Monteith's account before the Treasury Department	250 00
Total	875 75

This claim has been repeatedly recommended for payment by the Indian Office and Interior Department, to wit, on December 14, 1876; on March 1, 1877; on January 11, 1882; on March 18, 1882, as set forth in official papers from the Indian Department.

This bill, introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress, was submitted to the Department of the Interior for examination and report, and was reported favorably upon in a communication of March 18, 1882. Six hundred and twenty-five dollars and seventy-five cents of this account was for money paid by John B. Monteith in defending the United States Indian agency in actions in ejectment brought in the United States Territorial courts; and $250 of the amount was allowance made by the Indian Department for additional clerical service at said agency. The sum total aggregates $875.75.

The following is a report and recommendation of the Interior Department:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 18, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 7, 1882, transmitting for report and office views thereon House bill No. 4741, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, "to adjust the accounts of Jno. B. Monteith, deceased," with accompanying papers.

The payment of the claim of Mr. Monteith has been repeatedly urged upon Congress, and was the subject of a favorable report (copy herewith) to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, under date of December 14, 1876, recommending that Congress be requested to appropriate the sum of $625.75 to reimburse Mr. Monteith for the money actually expended and paid out by him in the ejectment suit of W. G. Langford vs. Employés of the Nez Percé Indian Reservation at Lapwai, Idaho.

It was further urged in a communication to Senator Windom (copy herewith), dated March 1, 1877, requesting the insertion in the sundry civil appropriation bill, then pending, an amendment making an appropriation covering said claim.

The justness and the merit of the amount ($250) disallowed in the final settlement of Agent Monteith's accounts, by the accounting officer of the Treasury Department, for additional pay for services rendered on account of authorized increase of salary as agency clerk, has never been questioned; but, as there was no authority of law for its allowance or payment, relief can only be had through Congress.

Concurring in the views of my predecessors as to the justness of the whole claim of $875.75, I urgently recommend favorable and prompt action on the bill submitted, which is returned herewith, with accompanying inclosures, as requested.

Very respectfully,

E. L. STEVENS,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. M. C. GEORGE,
House of Representatives.

The following is a copy of a letter from the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 14, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the claim of John B. Monteith, United States Indian agent, for certain expenses of rent, costs, and fees unavoidably incurred by the employés in their defense at the trial of the ejectment suits of W. G. Langford vs. Employés of the Nez Percé Indian Reservation at Lapwai, Idaho Territory. These expenses were necessarily incurred, owing to the distance from the agency of the proper United States district agency, as well as the difficulty of prompt communication with him or the Department, and to the exigencies of the case, which have been duly and fully reported to this office.

From these facts and the circumstances of the parties who were mulcted with the costs, and who are hardly able to bear the same, and in view of the fact that by this course of action they were enabled to hold the agency buildings, and thereby avert their total destruction by the Indians, who would undoubtedly have burned them rather than allow them to pass into Mr. Langford's possession, I respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate the sum of $625.75 to fully reimburse Mr. Monteith for all moneys actually expended and paid out by him in said defense.

For your further information I submit herewith duplicate copies of an itemized statement of the expenses incurred, which were furnished by Mr. Monteith under office instructions of the 19th of July, 1875.

I also submit the draught of a bill for the purpose above indicated.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. Q. SMITH, Commissioner.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

From the papers on file in this case it appears that Mr. Langford made attempt by seven actions in ejectment in the justice, district, and supreme courts of Idaho to recover possession of the land upon which the Government agency buildings had been erected; that he was successful in the actions in the justice court and in the district court, but was finally defeated in the supreme court. These expenses were unavoidably incurred by Mr. Monteith to save the occupancy of the Government buildings after judgment rendered in the justice courts and until the Department could be heard from, and for the expenses of an appeal to the district court and to the supreme court, where the cases were finally decided in favor of the Government. It is quite evident from the proofs on file that had Mr. Monteith not expended these sums the Government would have been the loser of much valuable property, both through the result of the trials establishing the right of Mr. Langford and the frenzy of the Indians, who would have doubtless burned the buildings rather than to have seen them come into the possession of Mr. Langford.

It will be remembered that this agency was then situated in an isolated section, more so probably than any other portion of the United States at that time, and communication with the Department was exceedingly difficult. Mr. Monteith's action in thus saving the Government property and looking after its interest in a time of emergency entitles him to the gratitude of his country; and the least it can do is to reimburse him for the sum of money which he necessarily expended during the emergency in the Government's behalf. Time has proven that it was a wise action on his part, and that he was faithful to the interest of the Indians and of the Government. In regard to the sum of $250, expended by Mr. Monteith for additional clerical assistance, as shown by vouchers Nos. 7, 11, 12, 16, and 30, on file now in the Second Auditor's Office, the following was the authority under which the expenditure was made:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., May 27, 1875.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 6th instant, in which you ask authority to increase the salary of your clerk from $1,000 to $1,200 per annum, you are informed that your request is granted, the amount involved to be paid from funds that are now or may hereafter be placed in your hands from the appropriation for "incidental expenses Indian service in Idaho."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

J. B. MONTEITH, Esq.,
United States Indian Agent, Lapwai, Idaho.

In view of the foregoing your committee believe this claim to be just and proper, and recommend that it be allowed and paid as set forth in the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, as this report contains a very full statement of the facts in this case I do not deem it necessary to occupy time with a further explanation, but move at once that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

JOHN P. T. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 328) for the relief of John P. T. Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant to John P. T. Davis, late second lieutenant of Company H, Fifty-second Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, an honorable discharge from the military service as of the date of November 6, 1862.

The report was read, as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims, first session Forty-seventh Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

[House Report No. 1494, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 5417:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5417) for the relief of John P. T. Davis, report as follows:

That the bill under consideration directs the Secretary of War to grant to John P. T. Davis, late second lieutenant Company H, Fifty-second Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, an honorable discharge from the military service as of the date of November 6, 1862.

The facts gathered from papers accompanying the bill show that John P. T. Davis was mustered in as second lieutenant with Company H, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteers, February 1, 1862, to serve three years. He was tried by general court-martial convened at Fort Pillow, Tennessee, pursuant to General Orders No. 2, of date October 29, 1862, from Headquarters District of Columbus; charge, absent without leave; found guilty, and sentenced to be dismissed from the service, to date from November 6, 1862. The disability to re-enter the service resulting therefrom was removed by letter from the Adjutant-General United States Army to the Governor of Indiana, dated January 15, 1866.

It appears from the proof submitted that on or about the 19th day of September, 1862, the said Lieutenant Davis was prostrated by a severe attack of fever, and became very feeble in body and in mind in consequence of said sickness, and while in this weak and debilitated state of mind and body that Major Strickland, then in command of the regiment, persuaded and induced the said Lieutenant Davis that he had better visit his home to regain his health; that he, the said Major Strickland, would see that it was all right, &c.; that under these inducements the said Lieutenant Davis left his post and went North, and returned voluntarily to his command as soon as his health was restored, in about three weeks afterward. Shortly after his return to his regiment he was summoned before a military court-martial, and on a charge of absence without leave was tried and dismissed the service. This was the whole offense for which this soldier was tried.

Your committee are of the opinion that the relief should be granted, and report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GEDDES moved that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN TAYLOR & SON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1198) for the relief of John Taylor & Son.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Taylor & Son, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $149.50, as full compensation for lumber used by the United States Army, as appears from evidence on file in the Third Auditor's Office, United States Treasury Department, in claim No. 8252.

The report was read, as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims No. 527, first session Forty-seventh Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill to the House and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 527, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 493:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 493) for the relief of John Taylor & Son, of Newport, Ky., respectfully report as follows:

These claimants seek compensation for the value of a quantity of lumber alleged to have been sold and delivered, in September, 1862, to the United States military authorities at Newport, Ky., for the improvement of fortifications at said place. The amount claimed is $149.50.

There is no difficulty in ascertaining the facts in this case. The evidence is abundant and without conflict. The papers establish the following facts: That in the summer of 1862 Newport and Covington, in Kentucky, and Cincinnati, Ohio, were seriously threatened by the appearance of large confederate military forces that were then moving in the direction of Newport. This threatened invasion of Ohio, and danger to Covington and Newport, induced the State of Ohio to call out a large militia force for the public defense. This militia force was under the immediate command of Col. James V. Guthrie, who was appointed for that purpose by the governor of Ohio, and instructed to take command of all the military troops in Kentucky. Colonel Guthrie thereupon appointed John R. Ricke as quartermaster, and at the same time created a military board.

At the time the militia force from Ohio met at Newport General Lew. Wallace was in command of United States troops in and about Newport and in the fortifications then existing at Newport. The military board appointed by Colonel Guthrie for the city of Newport had the power given them to make all necessary purchases of lumber to construct platforms upon which to operate the artillery in Forts Beechwood, Shaler, and Licking. It is proved and conceded that lumber of the value of $149.50 was purchased of these claimants by the parties so authorized, and that the same was used for the purpose specified; that claimants were at the time, and continued to be, loyal citizens of the United States, and have never received any portion of the value of said lumber.

It appears from the evidence that General Lew. Wallace, then in command of the United States forces at Newport, directed the building of said forts and improvements for which said lumber was purchased.

William H. Lappe testifies "that he was appointed one of the board mentioned; that said lumber was purchased and used; that he believed the same to be necessary to the efficiency of said forts and for the protection of the United States forces then occupying said forts; that Genera' Lew Wallace was then in command of the district embracing Newport, Ky., and directed the building of said forts, and they were constructed under his direction."

Colonel Guthrie testifies to substantially the same facts.

This claim was filed May 6, 1868, in the Treasury Department for payment, where the same remained without any action until February, 1877, when the voucher was returned to the claimants with the information "that the military forces of which John R. Ricke (who purchased this lumber of claimants) was quartermaster were not mustered into the service of the United States, and, although the military operations of this force were for convenience directed by a general officer of the United States Army, it was not mustered into the United States service or paid by the United States."

Thereupon claimants filed a bill in the Forty-fifth Congress, and again in the Forty-sixth Congress, for relief. An adverse report was made by this committee during the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, solely on the ground that it did not seem to be a claim against the Government of the United States.

Now, your committee have carefully reviewed the evidence in this case, and believe it to be a good claim against the Government of the United States, supported by every principle of law and equity. If, under the same circumstances, and prompted by the same emergency, General Wallace, in command of the United States forces, had in person made these purchases of lumber, it would be conceded a valid claim against the General Government. In law and good conscience he did make the purchase. He decided that the material was necessary for the "common defense" and to guard and protect the United States troops under his command. He directed the construction of works for which this lumber was needed, and superintended the use of this lumber. It does not appear to be a matter of much consequence who acted in making the purchase, nor whether they were officers or soldiers of the United States. They may have been private citizens from the farms, workshops, stores, and other places of private life, hastily volunteering their services for the defense of the country. Or the forces may have assumed more formality and been acting as militia of a State. But it is submitted by your committee that when said forces were under the direction and military control of a United States officer, and when thus acting made purchases for the benefit of the United States under the direction of said officer, it would work great injustice to the claimants to deny them relief.

Your committee therefore report the bill back to the House and recommend its passage.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, we have got a large number of bills on the Private Calendar, and we have but one day in each week assigned for their consideration. According to my recollection this is the first time we have devoted Friday to that purpose. Some gentleman, and I am not aware who he is, insists on reading all these reports. Nobody hears them; nobody cares about them; nobody is concerned in that question. It seems to me we might expedite the consideration of these bills by a statement that a committee composed of a majority of the other side of the House had carefully examined them and reported them to this body as creditable bills. Why take up the time of this House with reading these reports to which no one listens and in this end of the Hall no one can hear? Is this a kind of suppressed filibustering instituted and organized by gentlemen on the other side? Have you not confidence in the reports of the majorities of your own committees? And when it is announced by the Clerk from the desk that the majority of the committee has carefully, studiously considered the subject and recommend its favorable action of this House, why should we go through the farce of reading a long report to which nobody gives any attention, or if he desired to give attention could not hear? I will vote for the bill, but I wanted to make these observations in reference to the honesty, morality, decency, intelligence, and judgment of the way in which the majority of the Democratic party is proceeding with the consideration of these bills. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GEDDES. I move that bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN D. LAKIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3521) for the relief of Benjamin D. Lakin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Benjamin D. Lakin, of Point Pleasant, Clermont County, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, for money paid for a substitute during the late war.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let us have the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims No. 675, first session Forty-seventh Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back a substitute for the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 675, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 5007:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1346) for the relief of Benjamin D. Lakin, having considered the same, respectfully report:

This claimant was, on the 28th day of September, 1864, duly drafted into the military service of the United States in the sixth district of Ohio, to serve for the period of one year; that in pursuance of said draft he reported himself forthwith to the marshal of said district, at Hillsborough, Ohio, and was immediately sent to Todd Barracks, at Columbus, Ohio. It further appears from the evidence that on the 10th day of October, 1864, and within the time allowed by law, he procured one John Smittle as a substitute for himself; that said substitute was duly and regularly accepted by the marshal of said district on the morning of the 10th of October, 1864, and was mustered into the service of the United States Army for the period of one year, and was thereupon duly assigned to Company C, Seventy-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; that said substitute served faithfully and remained in the Army until he died, on the 30th of April, 1865.

It is also clearly established in the proof that on the 10th of October, 1864, an order was telegraphed by said marshal from Hillsborough to the commandant of Todd Barracks, at Columbus, Ohio, "that said substitute had been furnished and accepted." It further appears that said order was duly received, and this claimant thereupon earnestly and diligently sought to obtain his discharge but failed, and he was, against his protests, on the 11th day of October, 1864, sent to the front for military duty, being assigned to Company E, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was placed on detached duty, as a train guard, in General Sherman's army, and performed the duties of a soldier up to the month of February, 1865, when he was taken sick, and subsequently, on the 10th of June, 1865, he was mustered out of the service.

Claimant made repeated efforts to obtain his discharge from the Army, but owing to the detached duty in which he was employed was unable to secure it until said 10th of June, 1865.

Claimant, in order to obtain his said substitute, paid him the sum of $1,000, which appears from the evidence to have been reasonable.

The evidence clearly establishes the fact that this claimant was compelled to perform this service for the Government without any fault or negligence on his part, and solely through the mistake and fault of the agents of the Government.

This claim was referred to the Adjutant-General of the United States in 1866, but not allowed, on the ground that there was no law providing for the payment of such claims.

From the foregoing facts your committee find that this claim is just, and that claimant should have some compensation for the services performed and the loss sustained. He served eight months, two-thirds of the time for which he had provided a substitute and had paid $1,000.

Your committee therefore find and report that claimant should be paid the sum of $1,000 for the time served by him; and recommend the passage of the substitute for said bill, herewith filed.

Mr. MOREY. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe, sir, so far as my own experience is concerned, it is the only bill involving this question which has been before this House, for I do not remember that it has been before this House before.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, it was before the House in the Forty-seventh Congress, and, under a suspension of the rules, was passed unanimously.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had forgotten that fact as to this bill. I remember it was before the Committee on Claims, but it is the first bill of the kind reported to Congress involving this question.

Mr. MOREY. There are precedents for this bill in prior Congresses.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not aware of that fact, and I will be glad if my friend from Ohio will call my attention to those precedents.

Mr. MOREY. I will do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish in the first place to make a single remark. A party in the late war was drafted and paid $1,000 for a substitute, and then he himself was afterwards drafted again, and served in the Army. The question involved here is whether the amount paid by him for a substitute should be returned.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the Government is to pay this class of claims at all, can the Government be required to pay more than was paid in the way of bounty to soldiers? It seems to me in this case, if you depart from that rule you will fix it so everybody who employed a substitute can call upon the Government for compensation, irrespective of the service rendered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, my friend from Tennessee puts the question I was seeking to present, and puts it very well. The Government at that time was paying, according to my present recollection, a bounty of $300. At the time that this transaction occurred I am under the impression that the $1,000 bounty was not being paid. I believe that $300 was the very highest sum the Government allowed for such service. The question presented, therefore, by this bill is not, perhaps, whether the relief should be granted, but what is the measure of the relief. If the facts are as stated and found by the committee it would seem to be a fit subject for relief. But the question is whether or not the contract made by the party should bind the Government to the extent of the full amount he paid, or whether the Government would be granting the full measure of relief warranted by the premises by refunding the amount it was then paying for bounty. In the Committee on War Claims in the last Congress I think the latter was regarded as the true principle.

The Government obtained in this case two soldiers. It was entitled to one, and was paying the bounty of $300. If the soldier was enlisted or drafted—and I presume he was drafted, under this report—of course he received the bounty himself if he served out his term, and the substitute would also, as my friend here on my right suggests. If I am correct, then the Government had paid two bounties if those parties served out their respective terms.

Mr. GEDDES. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that drafted men were paid bounties?

Mr. HOLMAN. Such is my impression.

Mr. GEDDES. I think not. I do not think drafted men were paid bounties.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am speaking from recollection. I think they were.

Mr. GEDDES. The amount of bounty, I will say to my friend from Indiana, paid by the party procuring a substitute would necessarily be in accordance with the value of the service of the man in the State where the draft occurred. The amount given by any person who procured a substitute would be governed by the law of supply and demand. Now, if the man who wants a substitute goes out into the market and obtains one at the lowest price possible in that State and community (and as I say the price of the substitute was fixed by the demand and varied with the locality), is it not fair to reimburse him to the extent paid by him?

Mr. HOLMAN. But, Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Ohio, it may be said that very high bounties were paid in certain cases where parties were excited or alarmed at the urgency of the draft. Suppose a party paid $2,000 for another man to go in his place—and I have heard of instances where such large sums were paid to obtain substitutes—should that be regarded as binding the Government? Shall the amount paid on the spur of the moment bind the Government, or should the Government pay back the sum it was actually paying for that service in other cases, $100, $200, or $300, as the case may be, depending upon the state of the law at the time?

I think the amount to be paid in the present case is the sum of $300, if that was the amount being paid by the Government at the time. I remember many years ago the same question came up involving two of my constituents; and the better opinion at that time of the Committee on Claims—this was before the Committee on War Claims was organized—was that each of them should be paid the sum of $300. But the subject was not pressed, and finally the bills were not reported back to the House. I thought then, and also when the same subject was before the last Congress, that the rule should be to fix the amount to be paid by the amount that the Government was paying at the time, and not the amount that a private citizen saw fit to pay for a substitute.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, as I had the honor of reporting this bill to the committee, and from the committee to the House in the last Congress, I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana, who stated his action in that committee, that when I reported this bill back to the committee, in order to more carefully guard the Treasury of the United States as against this man who was compelled to serve when he was not bound by law, yet acting in the most rigid manner against him, I made a report that he should be allowed $666.66, being two-thirds of the $1,000 that he had paid for the substitute; and for this reason, that he had served himself only two-thirds of the year. His substitute served and died in the Army. He himself was compelled to serve until he could procure his discharge. He procured it as soon as he could be heard by the Government. He was put on detached duty from time to time, but sought through a brother and friend diligently and constantly to secure his own discharge, his substitute being in the service at the same time. He was utterly unable to do that for some time, but afterward, however, he got the ear of the officers of the Government, and was discharged from the service at the expiration of eight months. I thought that possibly he would be content with two-thirds of the amount he had paid, he having served two-thirds of the time for which he had provided a substitute. But with the single exception of the gentleman from Indiana and myself, in our care against any intrusions upon the Treasury, the committee unanimously conceded that not only should the man who had provided the substitute be paid the amount which we had recommended, but that the recommendation was an injustice to the soldier and citizen in not being large enough, and overruled us both, allowing him by their unanimous action the full thousand dollars originally claimed. Now, why? Because he proved that that was the lowest sum for which he could purchase the services of a substitute at that time. He proved that he paid that money; and yet in face of the fact that they took his substitute, and accepted his services, they impressed him into the service, taking him by military force, and put him into the Army. They took him up and down the land for a period of eight long months, away from his family, away from his business, and made him perform duty in the public service where he was not required to be.

My colleague from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] says there are precedents to be found for this act. If I believed it, I would not go to search for them. I would not go to the record to find five hundred precedents for an act of justice so plain, so simple, so manifest, that if it is denied it would shock every man's sense of justice. You may sustain it by precedents if you have them. I do not care to hear them.

Mr. MOREY. I do not consider it necessary to say anything in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] in support of this bill. I desire, however, to correct a misapprehension into which gentlemen have fallen in their arguments pro and con.

At the time the claimant in this case procured a substitute to go into the Army, the law which permitted a man to pay $300 commutation money had been repealed. A man who was drafted was called upon to go into the service or to furnish some one to go for him. This claimant was one of four brothers, three of whom had already gone into the service. He was the youngest, and was drafted from his home also to go into the service. His brothers made up the sum of $1,000 in order that this younger brother might remain at home with his aged parents, as is conclusively shown by the evidence on file. The sum which he paid for his substitute was a reasonable sum. It was not a sum paid for the purpose of keeping some one out of the Army, but it was for the purpose of supplying a soldier for the ranks.

After he had paid this sum of money he was by force, through an inadvertence and misunderstanding upon the part of the mustering officers, compelled also to go and serve his time in the Army; and this man who had paid this money was compelled to remain in the Army for a long period.

I submit that the measure of compensation should not be the $300 under the previous law, but that it should be the sum of $1,000, which the committee have found and reported to this House to be a reasonable sum paid for the purpose of procuring a substitute. I again, Mr. Chairman, move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to put a question to my friend from Ohio [Mr. MOREY]. The Government was entitled to one soldier under this draft, and the substitute was the person whom the Government obtained. The party for whose relief this bill is sought to be passed was in the service a period of nine months or a little less. Now, is not this in effect paying him a bounty—for the Government was entitled to the other—paying him a bounty of $1,000 for that period of time? Is not that the exact effect of it?

Mr. MOREY. No, sir; it is not a bounty, because the claimant had parted with his money under the agreement with the Government that if he furnished a substitute he would be excused from the draft. He complied with that understanding and agreed with the Government. He and his friends parted with this money and yet he was compelled to go in and serve his time. It is not a bounty.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government was entitled to one soldier, and that soldier went into the service and served seven or eight months and then died. The person who had employed the substitute goes into the service——

Mr. GEDDES. Is forced in.

Mr. HOLMAN. Forced in if you please—and he is paid like every other soldier his $15 a month. And now you propose to pay him in addition for these eight or nine months of service, after being paid in the regular way, the additional sum of $1,000. Mistakes of this kind were made all the time.

Mr. MOREY. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana, I will state the Government was entitled to one soldier under that draft and not to two. The Government got its one soldier by means of this claimant paying $1,000 to procure him, under the plain understanding he should himself be exempt from the draft. And I say the Government ought now to refund the money which it compelled him upon that understanding to pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend excuse me for this interruption again? The way in which the three-hundred-dollar feature presented itself was not as I had thought. That was the commutation. The Government during a very considerable period drafted the citizen, and he either went into the service himself or paid the $300 into the Treasury and the Government used it to employ somebody else.

Mr. MOREY. That law had been repealed.

Mr. STORM. The difficulty was the commutation-money which the Government took in lieu of the personal services of the man who was drafted never bought a substitute. I know of my own knowledge, when the commutation law of $300 was in force, that $300 never paid for a substitute, because in the same neighborhood $600 and $1,000 had to be paid as bounty.

In this case it was an agreement between the man drafted and the Government. After he furnished his substitute the Government had no claim upon him. Yet he was compelled to do certain services which he was not bound to do under the law. The question here is how much did it cost him to relieve himself of the duty he was not bound to do? What it cost him to relieve himself is exactly the measure of his rights as between him and the Government. The commutation of $300 would not have relieved him. The question is what he had to pay when he went into the market and bought on the best terms he could the services of a man willing to be his substitute. I claim in equity and in law that what he had to pay because of the wrongful acts of the Government is just the measure of his equitable relief.

Mr. GEDDES. I renew the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. WOLFORD. Believing, as I conscientiously do, that this report and the bill are all wrong, wrong in principle and wrong in theory, I wish before the vote is taken to be heard a moment.

The Government of the United States as well as the government of the confederacy exercised the right to claim and did claim the services of every one of its citizens. In the United States a man had the privilege when drafted either to go into the service himself, or if for any reason he was not willing himself to enter the service, to get a substitute. Now, under the law, and under a fair understanding of the matter, I presume nobody will say that his substitute could not also be called upon when occasion required to render service to the country. He who employed the substitute might expect, when every able-bodied man was demanded to defend his country, that the very moment the call for service was so extended it would embrace his substitute, and he himself would have to go into the service as well as the substitute.

There has been no wrong done to this man. He stood only as every other good citizen stood, liable to be called upon to render all the service in his power for the side he had espoused. If the Government of the United States had a right to release him from service when the substitute went into the Army, it also had a right to call upon him for service when the demand was so extended as to include the substitute.

Mr. GEDDES. Will my friend permit me to appeal to his sense of justice in this way: what did the Government mean when it said to this man, "You may furnish a substitute for yourself for this service?" Did the Government simply mean to trifle with him; to say to him,

"Yes, furnish your substitute; put him in; and when we have got him we will take you also?" Did the Government mean that?

Mr. WOLFORD. No, sir; it did not mean to trifle with him; neither did it mean that he should trifle with the Government. The Government meant to say to him, as it said to all good citizens, "For the present you can be excused if you furnish a substitute; but if the time comes when the services of all are demanded and required, then you shall go into the service yourself." No other course of reasoning would be right.

And now I appeal to the sense of justice of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES]. Was it a trick to defraud the Government of the services of all its citizens when they were needed? Could one-half of its citizens when drafted obtain inferior men as substitutes (and they generally got inferior men), and put them into the service and thereby excuse themselves?

I said that this whole thing was wrong. If you would do justice in the matter you would give the thousand dollars to the widow and children of the poor fellow who was killed, and not to the man who afterward escaped and got out of the service of the United States by appealing to the sympathy of the officers.

Mr. STORM. Does not the gentleman see that his whole argument is made simply against the original policy of the Government, and is not applicable to this particular case? I admit that the argument of the gentleman would be entitled to some force if it had been made in this House some years ago, when the question of what should be the policy of the Government in this matter was under consideration. But I am afraid the gentleman from Kentucky has not actually mastered the facts in this particular case, judging from the line of his argument.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me answer the argument of the gentleman.

Mr. WOLFORD. Wait a minute; I want to talk a little myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES]?

Mr. WOLFORD. No, sir; I do not yield any more. They have answered me twice, and that is enough. I say to these gentlemen that they have misunderstood the policy of the Government. I deny that there ever was any policy on the part of the Government of the United States to excuse a man from the service he owed when the time came that it was needed simply because he had furnished a substitute for a little while. I deny that any such suicidal policy ever was adopted by the country which I love.

Mr. STORM. It was the law.

Mr. WOLFORD. You will excuse me. I deny there was any such policy.

Mr. STORM. It was the law.

Mr. WOLFORD. Produce the law. I deny that that was ever the policy; I deny that it was ever the law, and I deny that it is justice. I deny that there is any truth or honesty in this claim. See how it would operate. Does the gentleman say that by the law a substitute for a time was received and afterward the Government could not require the services of all its citizens? Did our Government act so foolishly and so unwisely as to adopt a policy by which one half of its able bodied citizens could be received as substitutes and the other half allowed to go free; that no matter how hard our friends in the South might press the Government at any time, no matter how much danger there might be to our forces, the Government deliberately adopted a line of policy which would deprive itself of the services of a portion of its citizens?

Mr. GEDDES. Does not the gentleman know that the law——

Mr. WOLFORD. I do not know that that was the law, neither do you. I know that the whole policy of this bill is wrong and unjust. When you appeal to my sense of justice, allow me to appeal to your own sense of justice. Do you want to take from the Treasury of the United States, after paying this man his price as a soldier, paying him what all other soldiers received, do you want to take from the Treasury of the United States this large sum of money and give it to him? I ask in the name of all the other soldiers that voluntarily fought in the Army, as well as those who were drafted and fought for their country in their own proper persons, that you think a little about them.

Mr. GEDDES. We are for all of them.

Mr. WOLFORD. Although this man simply did his duty when forced to do it, you want to put your hand into the Treasury of the United States and give him $1,000 extra compensation. This seems to me unjust and unreasonable. This is all I want to say. Now the gentleman can answer me as much as he pleases.

Mr. MAYO. Mr. Chairman, I wish not to make a speech but simply to ascertain, and I trust to enable the House to ascertain, the exact status of this matter. If I should be wrong in any assumption that I may make I wish to be corrected.

As I understand this case, a person liable to be enlisted in the Army under the laws of the United States employed a man to take his place—a man not liable to that service. Am I right so far? Of course he could not put in his place any man who was liable to render service in the Army; he must have put in as a substitute some one whom the United States could not compel to serve as a soldier.

Mr. MOREY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MAYO. Now, if I put another man in my place for a particular service, and pay him for thus taking my place, is not the contract between the Government and myself mutual? Am I not forever absolved when the Government accepts the service of another man?

Mr. MOREY. Certainly.

Mr. MAYO. And if that other man happens to be killed, I am vicariously killed. After my substitute dies the Government has no right to come back on me; for I am in the eye of the law dead.

Mr. MILLER. And your widow ought to have a pension! [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYO. Now, I understand further that after the death of his substitute in the military service, this man was called on again to do service in the Army of the United States. Am I right?

Mr. MOREY. The gentleman will permit me to explain. The man who hired the substitute was sent to the front on the same day that the substitute was.

Mr. STORM. Both commenced their service at the same time.

Mr. MOREY. Yes, sir. The substitute served until his death, and the man who hired the substitute served until the end of the war—June, 1865.

Mr. MAYO. Then, Mr. Chairman, I think there is no power in the Government to make one man two men.

Mr. MOREY. Then give this man back his thousand dollars, and it is all right.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BRUMM. As there seems to be some misunderstanding in regard to the facts of this case, and as I desire to vote intelligently, I wish to put a question, and I hope the gentleman in charge of this bill will answer it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] stated that the party who is to receive the money under this bill, and who was drafted, obtained a substitute; that the substitute went into the Army, and afterward the substitute was drafted. Is that the fact?

Mr. STORM. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, the gentleman from Kentucky made that statement.

Mr. STORM. He was as wrong in his statement as he was in his law.

Mr. BRUMM. Then the substitute never was drafted afterward?

Mr. MOREY. I will explain. The claimant in this case, Mr. Lakin, having been drafted, availed himself of the privilege given him by law of going into the market and procuring a substitute. The substitute was mustered in, but through a misunderstanding on the part of the provost-marshal and the mustering officer Mr. Lakin, who had procured the substitute, was mustered in on the same day as the substitute and hastened to the front. He never succeeded in getting out of the service until the close of the war, June, 1865.

Mr. PERKINS. What became of the substitute?

Mr. MOREY. He served until April, 1865, when he died in the service.

Mr. PERKINS. How long did he serve?

Mr. MOREY. About six months.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Was the drafted man discharged from the service because of having furnished a substitute?

Mr. MOREY. He was not discharged until June, 1865, the close of the war.

Mr. GOFF. The substitute never was drafted?

Mr. MOREY. The substitute never was drafted.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MOREY that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House, there were—ayes 95, noes 30.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. COX, of North Carolina, and Mr. MOREY as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 141, noes 37.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation it do pass.

SIDNEY HENDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3522) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the alleged taking by the United States authorities, for the use of the Army during the late war, of a certain lot of timber and fencing alleged to have been the property of John Henderson, deceased, of Bradley County, Tennessee; such investigation to extend to the title of the property taken and used, the status of the owner, whether loyal or not, and the value of the property destroyed and used; and when such investigation shall be completed the Quartermaster-General shall report the result thereof, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress, as in cases provided for in the second section of the act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, &c., approved July 4, 1864.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The claimant is the widow and executrix of John Henderson, who resided in Cleveland, Bradley County, Tennessee, and who died January 16, 1863. The claim is for timber which was taken for military purposes by the Army of the United States in 1864 and 1865.

Mr. Henderson left a will, dated August 3, 1861, and a codicil, dated June 7, 1862. Mrs. Henderson, the petitioner, is the sole acting executrix of that will.

It is to be presumed that the testator left sufficient to pay all his legacies and bequests. No distribution of the estate is to be made until the death of the executrix. She is provided for specifically by the terms of that will, and this claim is disposed of in the residuary clause of the will, which reads as follows:

"The remainder of my estate not disposed of by legacies and bequests, if any remain at the death of my wife, Sidney, I give and bequeath as a charity to the poor of Bradley County, Tennessee, and the same shall be used, applied, and appropriated for the exclusive use of the poor at the poor-house of Bradley County, Tennessee, for their support and maintenance," &c.

The executrix on February 27, 1873, filed a claim before the Commission of Claims for adjudication. The commission investigated the alleged taking of the property and the loyalty of claimant, and the taking and use of the property was fully established, as was the loyalty of the claimant, but rejected the claim solely upon the ground that they could not tell who were the real beneficiaries of the claim.

The committee are satisfied that the claimant was loyal to the United States Government, but are not satisfied as to the amount of the property taken and used by the Army.

The committee therefore report herewith a bill conferring power upon the Secretary of War to have the case investigated through the Quartermaster's Department, and to report the result, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress for its action in the premises.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, this case was presented to the Southern Claims Commission February 27, 1873. As shown by the report of the committee, that commission investigated the alleged taking of the property and the loyalty of the claimant, and the taking and use of the property was fully established, as was the loyalty of the claimant. It was rejected solely because the poor of Bradley County was not a party to the application. By Mr. Henderson's will his widow was left his sole executrix, and the remainder of his estate, after disposing of legacies and bequests, was left to the poor of Bradley County, Tennessee. And as I have said, the claim was rejected solely because the poor of that county did not join as a party to the application, although she was the sole executrix. The War Claims Committee provide that the case shall be investigated through the Quartermaster's Department and the result reported to Congress. This old lady lived in the district I have the honor to represent on this floor, but afterward removed to Knoxville. She is 85 or 90 years old, and is drawing a pension as the widow of a soldier of the war of 1812. The amount of the claim is $2,310.

I offer the following substitute:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the proper accounting officers of the United States be, and are hereby, directed to pay to Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased, of Bradley County, Tennessee, amount of her claims filed and proved before the Southern Claims Commission February 27, 1873, amounting to the sum of $2,310, which shall be in full compensation for her claim.

Mr. GEDDES. On the question of this substitute I wish to say to the committee that the amount has not been investigated by the Committee on War Claims. This case having been referred to that committee, it was considered by them and they ordered the report to be made as has been indicated. Now, whether the amount named by the gentleman from Tennessee is correct, or whether that will be found to be the just amount due to this party on investigation, I am not prepared to say. Our committee has not reported, and that question has not been investigated; and it would certainly be dangerous for us, on the motion of a friend of a party, to substitute the amount of his claim for the bill which is reported when the very purpose of the latter is to ascertain the exact amount due. The committee not believing the proof sufficient to satisfy them of the amount due, they have declined to report any specific amount. They have gone as far as they could. They are as favorable as they can be in reporting in favor of a reinvestigation by the Quartermaster's Department with a view to ascertain the real amount due this party.

To show how exceedingly dangerous it would be to adopt this I need only say that we have numerous cases in which the parties claim, as near as I can recollect, $156,000 each, where there would be a report for perhaps of ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars. It is a very common thing to find on examination of the papers that 1, 2, or 3 per cent. of the amount claimed is the utmost that should be allowed to the party. So that this amount that is found in the papers as the claim of the party can not be adopted here without overriding the action of the committee and without invading their province, as well as by walking on what I regard as exceedingly dangerous ground. I hope, therefore, that the report of the committee will be adopted by the House.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio that the amount of the claim in this case I have ascertained from the papers on file in the room of the Committee on War Claims from its clerk.

Mr. GEDDES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DIBRELL. And I think the amount is correct. I have stated that I know some of the facts in connection with the case. Now, this old lady is 85 or 90 years old, and by the time the matter can be investigated, as proposed by the terms of the committee's bill, she will most probably, in the course of nature, be dead. I think, therefore, we had better pay her now and be done with the question. Let her have the advantage of what she is entitled to while she is living.

Mr. GEDDES. And let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee that our clerk does not know the amount that is due to parties who present such claims, nor do we undertake to impose upon him the responsibility of deciding how much is due to them. He could ascertain, of course, from the records of the committee, how much different parties claim, but we have in the 2,000 bills now pending before that committee about $300,000,000 of claims involved. It will relieve the Treasury of the fullness of which our friend from Colorado complains if you pass such an amendment as this, and I wonder that he is not here advocating the proposition.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say what amount the evidence discloses as having been absolutely proved in this case, because I have not examined it with that view. But I wish to say for the information of the committee that as to the fact of the Government having used a large amount of this specific kind of property, as stated in this report, that is to say, timber and other property of that character, there can be no question. There is no doubt of the fact that the property was used. Now, here is an old lady 85 or 90 years old who has been deprived of the benefit of the property, as well as of the money that is due her for it, because that learned commission, the Southern Claims Commission, that did such a vast amount of justice to Southern claimants, were unable to determine who should receive this money under the provisions of the will. I believe that this House is capable of judging wisely and correctly on that clause of the will quoted in the report of the Committee on War Claims. I believe that the Committee on War Claims have decided the question in recommending it to the Secretary of War to be investigated and reported upon. But now, if this is to go back to run the gauntlet of this reinvestigation through all the processes of the Quartermaster-General's Office and the War Department, that old lady will have gone to her final rest perhaps without ever having received a single cent of the money that is certainly, justly, honestly, and fairly due to her.

I know, Mr. Chairman, and there are several gentlemen, I apprehend, on that side of the House who will corroborate what I say, that this lady is of such a character that she stands before the community in which she resides in such an attitude that she would scorn to ask the Congress of the United States or any other body or any party to give her one single cent that she did not honestly and conscientiously believe was justly due to her. I apprehend, sir, that my friend and colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] has examined the question carefully, has fixed the amount in his proposed substitute accurately, that he comes before this House with a full knowledge of the facts and asks us to pass the bill understandingly, and for one I ask this committee, in order to do justice to this old lady before it is too late, to pass the bill in the shape of the amendment. What good can it possibly do her if we adopt the report of the committee to let this matter be reopened and reinvestigated and then when she is dead have the question presented to us as to the amount? If the amount is too large in the judgment of any gentleman upon the floor, let it be cut down. If you are going to give anything, give it now. Do not put her off until the resurrection.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me remind the gentleman from Tennessee, as he was on the committee and is quite familiar with the character of its business, of the fact that this claim originated some twenty years ago. Now, is it not quite common to hear the remark just made by him, that the parties are growing old, and that they are poor, and unless they get their money at once, at this session of Congress, they will have to go to the poor-house? I ask him if that has not been commonly said on this floor? I have heard that assertion in reference to not less than $200,000,000 of claims pending before our committee.

Mr. HOUK. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio by saying that I had some serious experiences on that committee. I have heard the same complaint often, but neither he nor myself have turned a deaf ear to it when we believed it was a just complaint and embodied the truth. Knowing these facts and knowing something of the circumstances of the taking and use of this property, I believe it to be a just claim, and in my judgment the amount is very nearly correct, if not absolutely so. I know the fact, too, that the old lady is exceedingly ill and liable to die at any time, and in the course of nature, from her advanced age, we all recognize it as a fact that she can not live very much longer. Therefore I repeat, if she is going to get anything of the amount that is justly due her, it should be given now; and this is a case where the rule to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred should apply; that is, we should open our ears to her just complaint. If it has lingered for twenty years it is all the more reason for prompt action on our part.

Mr. STORM. Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee, for his comfort, that if the old lady dies, he may rest assured that the claim is immortal; that never dies. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. Yes, that is true; but its immortality does not do her mortality any good. What I want to do is to do something for mortality while it lingers here in the mortal sphere.

Mr. TULLY. It will be a suspended legacy.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] has the report of the Southern Claims Commission on this case, it would be well to have it read.

Mr. DIBRELL. I have not got that report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think in the absence of the report of the Southern Claims Commission, on which this proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee seems to be based, it would certainly be very unsafe to name a specific sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the substitute for the pending bill offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL].

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute, there were—ayes 112, noes 42.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. DIBRELL, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 43.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill as amended to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say before the vote is taken on that question that I fear the Committee of the Whole by its action on this bill is placing the Committee on War Claims in a very perilous position. It is not pretended by my friend from Tennessee or any other gentleman who has spoken that he knows as to the amount which could justly be claimed from the Government. All my friend from Tennessee has said on that point is this: that he went to the War Claims Committee room and learned there that the claim was so much.

Mr. DIBRELL. Will the gentleman allow me to say that in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses I had this case up and went through the papers. Governor Eden, chairman of the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-fifth Congress, told me it was as plain a case as he had ever met with, and that if it had come up sufficiently early in that Congress he would have reported in favor of its payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman states that Mr. Eden declared the claim was a just claim. But did he state the exact amount that was due by the Government?

In what position are you to put your Committee on War Claims if after they have examined the case and are not able to reach a conclusion as to the amount you shall here in Committee of the Whole fix the amount without any testimony before you as to the value of the property? I think to secure a fair consideration of the just claims against the Government a very different principle should prevail. This claim had its day of hearing before the Southern Claims Commission. If the report of that commission was before the committee we would have some data on which to act. As it is, we are acting absolutely without information as to the amount of this claim.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I should not say a word at this stage of the proceedings if I were not confident that members do not understand the real situation. I can not account for the vote which has just been taken upon any other theory. I wish to give notice that I shall demand the yeas and nays at the proper time. This will give those who desire an opportunity to reconsider their votes. It will also give an opportunity to those who vote for the passage of the bill as it is sought to be amended to leave a record of their remarkable vote. I shall be surprised if the yea and nay vote does not show a decided change.

The Committee on War Claims have given this bill careful investigation. They are satisfied, and they so report, that there are not sufficient proofs to warrant the allowance of the claim. They report that the evidence is entirely unsatisfactory—so unsatisfactory that before the claim is allowed, if it is to be allowed at all, further evidence should be taken. They recommend that it be referred to the Quartermaster-General for that purpose.

The proposition now is to insert the amount suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee and to summarily pass the bill.

No gentleman on the floor claims to have read the evidence. I think I am safe in saying that no one here has examined it except the members of our committee.

The only reason I have heard assigned for the proposed action is that the claimant is an old lady, and that in the course of events she is going to die. Such suggestions as this are not new to the members of our committee, and in dealing with the Southern claims which come before us they are not regarded as highly as they would seem to be on this floor if the vote just taken has any significance. In our judgment these claims should be regarded with some scrutiny.

When our committee report unanimously that a claim should not pass without more testimony, and the House see fit to vote for it in the dark, the responsibility is with the House and not with the committee. If the people's money is to be voted away in that manner, and upon insufficient evidence, it is time that they should know it, and the committee will demand a recorded vote?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is it a unanimous report by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. It is.

Mr. HOUK. I desire to reiterate this fact which I have already stated. I have not examined as to the definite amount; but I can say from my own personal knowledge that I feel perfectly confident that if this claim was allowed to double or treble this amount this party would not be sufficiently paid what the Government justly owes her. The amount fixed in the bill of my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] is a very small part of what is justly due that estate. I know something about the facts and the circumstances.

Mr. STORM. I wish to ask this question: Why should the House have a committee to ascertain the facts in any case if its report is to be set aside because a member stands up and states that he knows the facts?

Mr. HOUK. In reply to the gentleman I will say that first the Committee on War Claims has its say and then this Committee of the Whole has its say. While as a rule I go with a committee, yet when I feel that a committee has made a mistake I wish to ask this Committee of the Whole to correct the mistake made by that committee.

Mr. GEDDES. Has the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] any knowledge of the facts of this case so as to be able to establish the items of the claim or the value of those items?

Mr. HOUK. I am aware of the fact that a large amount of valuable timber was taken and used by the Federal Army from this identical estate and that other property was taken and used. I am aware of the high character of those parties, and I will say that I would not present a claim here that I was not satisfied was founded upon absolute justice and right.

Mr. GEDDES. Oh! that is said in behalf of all who come here with claims against the Government.

Mr. HOUK. I would not make a statement of this kind on this floor when I did not feel the facts were behind me to sustain it.

Mr. GEDDES. But your own belief is one thing and the result of the legal investigation to ascertain the amount and value of the property involved is another thing. The object in referring this case to the committee was that they might investigate and not take your belief merely. If the Committee of the Whole were to take your belief they could have taken it before sending the bill to the committee. But the House having appealed to the Committee on War Claims to investigate the case and having received the unanimous report of that committee, then to take merely the gentleman's naked belief as opposed to the committee's report in the absence of all proof would endanger all our action.

Mr. HOUK. My belief, unlike the opinion of the gentleman, is founded upon a series of indubitable and uncontradictable facts; that is, upon what I know about the situation of this matter.

Mr. DIBRELL. I desire to say, in reply to remarks made about this being founded upon a mere statement of mine, that if I did not believe this claim was eminently proper and just I would not offer the substitute. But I am thoroughly convinced of the justice of this claim.

Mr. HOPKINS. I voted for the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL], but it appears to me now that it may endanger the passage of the bill. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which that substitute was adopted in order that there may be redress in the manner reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DIBRELL. I hope that that will not be done.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to reconsider.

Mr. DIBRELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBRELL. I desire to inquire if, according to the rules of the House, it is competent in Committee of the Whole to move to reconsider?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. DIBRELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question upon laying aside the bill as amended to be reported favorably to the House will practically present the same question.

The question was taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House; and upon a division there were—ayes 97, noes 60.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: No quorum has voted.

Mr. DIBRELL. You can have the yeas and nays on the question in the House, if you want.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DIBRELL and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 93, noes 56.

Mr. HOLMAN (one of the tellers). I will not insist upon a quorum.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES. I want to give notice, if that is necessary, that the yeas and nays will be called in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill as amended will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SEPTIMIA R. MEIKLEHAM.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence; reported from the Committee on Pensions by Mr. ROBINSON, of New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object to the consideration of that bill at this time. I make the objection because the gentleman who presented the views of the minority in this case is unavoidably absent, and he desires to be present when the bill is considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope this bill will not go over. We have been waiting some time to get an opportunity to consider it. I am willing to pay as much respect to Mr. STOCKSLAGER as any gentleman on this floor, but I trust this bill will not be put off on that account.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire whether this bill was not laid over the last time it was reached at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON], and is it not now fair that it should be laid over again at the request of the gentleman representing the minority of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule as to the effect of an objection to considering a bill in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House. (Rule XXIII, clause 4.)

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want to say one word.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will make this proposition, rather than give trouble by having the committee do what the rule compels it to do: if it is understood that this bill will come up the first thing on Friday next, I will make no objection to its being passed over at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that this bill would retain its present status on the Calendar. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] having objected to the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read, the committee, in pursuance of the rule, will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. REED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar having had under consideration the Private Calendar and having reached the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence, and objection to its consideration having been made, the committee rose in pursuance of the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is whether the House will sustain the objection made in Committee of the Whole to the consideration of the bill the title of which has been stated.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 61.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest that the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has expressed a willingness that the bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole may go over provided it does not lose its place on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I so understood the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, to act as tellers.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Before the tellers take their places, as it is evident that all this session will be consumed in the consideration of this bill if it is proceeded with, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HISCOCK. Pending that motion, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken upon the motion of Mr. HISCOCK, it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 47, noes 99.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that the House adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. Pending that motion, I move that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence of the motion for a recess.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I now move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock, the session this evening to be, under the previous order of the House, for the consideration of pension bills.

The motion for a recess was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon sustaining the objection made in Committee of the Whole to the consideration of the bill last reached upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill referred to be passed over until next Friday, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] having it in charge. That is a courtesy usually extended when asked, and I hope it will be granted now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the bill now pending in the Committee of the Whole House be passed over until next Friday. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want to say a word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the bill now pending in Committee of the Whole be laid aside until next Friday. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar will resume its session.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

MYRON E. DUNLAP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Myron E. Dunlap, late first lieutenant of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, was cashiered from the service for tendering his resignation; and

Whereas said dismissel was based upon insufficient grounds: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said First Lieutenant Myron E. Dunlap, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, be, and he is hereby, honorably discharged from the military service of the United States, with like effect and with the same rights and privileges in all respects as if he had been regularly mustered out with said Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery on the 26th day of August, 1865; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to enter upon the proper records of the War Department the corrections made by this act of the military record of said officer.

Mr. REAGAN. If there is a report accompanying this bill I ask that it be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill H. R. 1389, for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap, respectfully reports:

That it has considered the bill (No. 1389) for the relief of Capt. Myron E. Dunlap, and with a view of excluding all claim for pay or compensation, which Captain Dunlap does not at all desire, only desiring the restoration of his good name on the records of the War Department, the committee reports the bill back to the House with an amendment, to wit:

Strike out all after the word "out," in the eighth line, down to and including the word "sixty-five," in the tenth line, and insert "of the military service of the United States on the 23d day of July, 1864." This is the date of Captain Dunlap's resignation.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-seventh Congress favorably reported a bill for the relief Captain Dunlap. It appears to your committee that the facts and reasons set forth in that report convincingly show that the relief sought for should be granted. Your committee therefore adopts that report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred bill H. R. 1445, for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap, respectfully reports the accompanying bill as a substitute, and recommends its passage.

Myron E. Dunlap entered the military service of the United States as second lieutenant of Company I, Seventy-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers. His associates in that regiment bear testimony to his fidelity to duty as an officer during the time he served with it. He was honorably discharged from that regiment on the 6th day of December, 1862. The motives which led to his discharge were these: His health had become impaired and he felt unable to perform the duties devolving upon him. He subsequently entered the military service as first lieutenant in the Fourteenth New York Artillery, and served with that regiment until the 23d of January, 1864, when he was sentenced by a general court-martial to be cashiered and to be forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or trust under the United States Government.

During the time he served in the Fourteenth Regiment of Artillery he made an excellent military record. Lieut. Theo. P. Cook, of the Fourteenth New York Artillery, says:

"He (Dunlap) went to the field with the Fourteenth New York Artillery and was with the regiment doing active service from the crossing of the Rapidan until the time of his discharge, and was with the regiment in all the engagements during that time. At the battle of the Wilderness he was conspicuous in commanding the skirmish line in front of our brigade and in capturing a number of prisoners. Again, on the 17th of June, 1864, at Petersburg, he had charge of the skirmishers in our front, and was exposed to a galling fire most of the day. In the evening of the same day he was wounded in the shoulder from a piece of shell which glanced from a tree near where the line was being formed. Lieutenant Dunlap was a brave, honorable soldier, and I have always regarded his dismissal as a great outrage and a crime, and the Government ought to set it right by placing him back on the muster-rolls of his regiment and by treating him in all respects as though he had been mustered out with his regiment at the close of the war."

Lieut. C. A. Vedder, of the same regiment, testifies substantially in the same way and speaks in the highest terms of the soldierly qualities and bearing of Lieutenant Dunlap.

Col. John Fisk, of the Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers; Capt. B. R. Keefler, of the Seventy-eighth New York Volunteers; General E. G. Marshall, who commanded the brigade in which the Fourteenth New York Artillery was placed, severally speak in the most complimentary manner of Lieutenant Dunlap's high character and efficiency as an officer.

It also appears that Lieutenant Dunlap was active in raising two companies for the service, the first of which was attached to the Seventy-eighth New York Regiment, and of which Dunlap was second lieutenant. The other company was attached to the Forty-eighth New York Artillery, and Dunlap was made first lieutenant of that company.

There is no doubt whatever that the conduct of Lieutenant Dunlap, from the time he first entered the service up until the time he had some difficulty with the officer in command of the Fourteenth New York Artillery, was unexceptionable and praiseworthy. The difficulty arose in this way: Dunlap was senior first lieutenant of Company A on the 1st day of June, 1864, when he was transferred to Company C, in which he was junior officer. He protested against this transfer, and addressed his protest to brigade headquarters, but no notice having been taken of it, Dunlap believes that Capt. L. J. Jones, the officer in command of the regiment, did not forward it. He inquired of Captain Jones why it was that he was transferred from Company A to Company C. Captain Jones replied that he was incompetent to command a company.

On the 24th day of July, 1864, Dunlap was transferred to Company E of his regiment. He felt that the last transfer indicated an intention not to return him to his own command, where he would have been in the line of promotion. Feeling aggrieved, Lieutenant Dunlap tendered his resignation, whereupon Captain Jones procured charges to be made against him. A court-martial was convened at the headquarters of the First Division of the Ninth Army Corps. The charge was, "conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline." There were two specifications to the charge. The first set forth that Dunlap did tender his resignation while in front of the enemy and under their fire. The second, that he did offer as a reason why his resignation should be accepted that he was incompetent. When the charges and specifications were read to him he asked that the hearing should be continued to the next day. This was refused. He informed the court that he would plead guilty to the specification that he had tendered his resignation, but to nothing else. The court thereupon considered the case, found him guilty of the charge and specifications, and sentenced him to be cashiered and forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or trust under the United States. When apprised of the civil disabilities imposed Dunlap made application to the President for their removal, which was granted upon the recommendation of Judge-Advocate-General Holt. The following is his opinion:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE, October 5, 1864.

To the PRESIDENT:

In the case of Lieut. Myron E. Dunlap, Fourteenth New York Heavy Artillery, the following report is respectfully submitted:

He was tried by general court-martial at headquarters First Division Ninth Army Corps, July 28, 1864, for "conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline." There were two specifications to the charge. The first set forth that he "did tender his resignation while in front of the enemy and under their fire." The second set forth that he "did offer as a reason why his resignation should be accepted that he was incompetent." He pleaded guilty to the specifications, and not guilty to the charge. He then requested an extension of time to produce a witness for the defense, which the court refused. He was found guilty of the charge and specification, and sentenced "to be cashiered, and forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or trust under the United States."

Lieutenant Dunlap, in making application for removal of the disability imposed by the sentence, says that the judge-advocate of the court had expressed the opinion that no severe punishment could be inflicted, and if the court thought the case merited so severe a punishment they should have given him the benefit of all the evidence he could produce. In a case of this description, in which the gravity of the offense depends so much upon the circumstances under which it was committed, every opportunity should have been given for the introduction of evidence.

No evidence was offered, and the accused did not avail himself of the privilege of making a statement. It appears, however, from the copy of a communication addressed by Lieutenant Dunlap to the assistant adjutant-general Ninth Army Corps, that his reason for offering his resignation was that he had been in command of Company A, and on June 1, 1864, was transferred to Company C, in which he was junior officer, the commanding officer of the regiment giving as a reason for the transfer that he was incompetent to command a company. He protested to the commanding officer of the brigade, but no notice was taken of his protest; he remained with Company C until July 24, when he was ordered to take command of Company E. Feeling that if he was incompetent to command Company A he was equally incompetent to command Company E, he offered his resignation on the ground of incompetency.

It is probable that his action was dictated by wounded pride, and not by a consciousness of incompetency; but though it was highly improper and deserving of punishment, it is conceived that the sentence of the court is heavier than the circumstances justified, especially as there is no express allegation in the specifications and no evidence upon the trial that his conduct was the result of cowardice or other improper motive.

Lieutenant Dunlap has filed the petition of twenty-six officers of his regiment, in which they certify to his character as a man and his efficiency as a soldier, and ask that the disability imposed by the sentence be removed.

In consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and the high standing of Lieutenant Dunlap as an officer, it is recommended that the request of the petitioners be granted.

J. HOLT, Judge-Advocate-General.

The adjudication of this case is singularly objectionable. The denial of Dunlap's request for the postponement of the hearing that he might produce witnesses was extraordinary even for a court-martial, for the Army Regulations expressly provide that the judge-advocate shall summon the necessary witnesses for the trial, and the Articles of War also provide for the taking of depositions of witnesses.

See article 74, edition 1861, and article 93 of the revised Articles of War, which says: "A court-martial shall, for reasonable cause, grant a continuance to either party for such time and as often as may appear to be just." Also, in the decisions of the Judge-Advocate-General, 880, page 299, paragraph 13, it is made the duty of the judge-advocate of the court to see that the accused has a fair trial and an opportunity to make full defense.

In addition to this the Army Regulations expressly authorized volunteer officers to resign. On page 12, Army Regulations 1861, paragraph 24, it is provided that "no officer will be considered out of the service on the tender of his resignation until it shall have been duly accepted by the proper authority." And paragraph 28, on same page, says: "In time of war, or with an army in the field, resignation shall take effect within thirty days from the date of the order of acceptance." Again, on page 497, Army Regulations 1861, paragraph 1647, we find authority for resignations in the following most emphatic language: "Officers of the volunteer service tendering their resignations will forward them through the intermediate commanders to the officer commanding the department or corps d'armée in which they may be serving, who is authorized to grant them honorable discharges;" not to court-martial them for it, but to grant them honorable discharges, as the law provides. (Vide act approved July 22, 1861, section 10; Army Regulations 1863, page 507.)

In the Digest of Opinions of the Judge-Advocate-General, page 430, he says: "While in time of peace an officer in the Army in good standing is in general entitled to tender and have accepted his resignation, yet in time of war, or when grave embarrassment to the service or prejudice to discipline may result from his leaving his duty, the acceptance of his resignation may be refused."

But nowhere does he say that an officer in time of war shall be court-martialed and dismissed for tendering his resignation, except in the case where it is tendered pending an engagement, and then the charge against him would be cowardice and not "conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline," as charged in this case.

As to the proper form of relief in such cases, it is laid down in the decisions of the Judge-Advocate-General, supra, page 478:

"In the case of a volunteer officer unjustly dismissed by sentence or order during the war, and applying for restoration, there is the obstacle (not encountered in the case of a regular officer) that the volunteer contingent of the Army has been long since disbanded, so that a restoration to office in the same is impracticable. And as a dismissed officer can not of course be granted an honorable discharge from the Army without first being readmitted to the Army by a new appointment, and as a volunteer officer can not as such be so readmitted, advised (February, 1880), in a case of a volunteer officer applying for relief on account of an unjust dismissal, that the form of relief most apposite to his case would be a special enactment, giving him pay from the date of his dismissal—reciting that the same was based upon insufficient grounds—to the date of the final muster-out of his regiment, precisely as if he had continued in the service during the interval."

As several acts of Congress have been passed since the close of the late war for the purpose of correcting the military records of dismissed officers and privates, the relief sought for in this case is not without precedent.

The following are some of the acts of Congress passed at former sessions to correct the military records and grant honorable discharges: See Private Acts, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 7, act April 13, 1876; Private Acts, first session Thirty-third Congress, page 366, No. 87; page 383, No. 147; page 437, No. 244; see, also, pages 343, 367, 394, 491 of same session. Acts were also passed at previous and subsequent sessions.

General Marshall, whose brilliant military record and high character entitle whatever he may say to the highest consideration, wrote a letter in relation to the petition of Lieutenant Dunlap, as follows:

LEHIGH GAP, January 31, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I have fully examined the case of the dismissal of First Lieut. M. E. Dunlap, Fourteenth New York Artillery, who was so dismissed for tendering his resignation. I was absent on account of wounds, and firmly believe if I had been present commanding my brigade, of which my regiment, Fourteenth New York Artillery, was then a part, that he would not have been brought before a court-martial. I feel certain that if the late General and Senator Burnside was alive he would as feelingly as myself coincide with me that an error, a great moral wrong, had been done this officer in his dismissal. I can only account for it that the Ninth Army Corps about that time went into the charge that succeeded the Petersburg mine explosion.

I shall be thankful if you will please examine his case in its legal sense; also, if you desire, my military record, and trust you will take an interest to correct the great wrong done him, his children, and family. I know him in no other light than as a gallant and faithful officer, and I can have but one feeling, of asking that justice may be done him.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. G. MARSHALL,
Col. and Bvt. Brig. Gen., U. S. A., and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Vols.

General THOMAS M. BAYNE, M. C.

Lieutenant Dunlap simply desires that the stain upon his record shall be removed. He does not ask for pay or allowances of any kind. The restoration of his good name is all that he seeks for. The question as to the power of Congress to set aside the judgment of the court-martial ought not to be raised in this case. Whatever may be the power of Congress in that regard, it will surely not be contended that a judgment founded upon a charge under an article of war which had no application and a specification which was not cognate to the charge can be otherwise than nugatory. It lacks such a judgment; lacks all the essentials of validity, and amounts to little more than a stain upon the military record of the party convicted.

Your committee contends, however, that Congress has power to set aside and make void the judgment of a court-martial, though it may be regular and strictly in accordance with military law. The power of Congress to legislate upon all subjects that fall within the purview of the Constitution is unlimited, unless the Constitution, expressly or by implication, forbids the exercise of the power. Congress has no power to pass a bill of attainder or an ex post facto law, nor any law which will impair the obligations of contracts. But when Congress enacts laws and articles of war which subject certain classes of the people to their control, to the performance of certain duties, or to the duties of the military or naval service, it can surely undo and extinguish that which has been done, regular or irregular, in pursuance of such laws, unless the undoing of it should violate some mandate of the Constitution.

The committee therefore holds that Congress has the power to remove the judgment in this case.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read:

In lines 8, 9, and 10 strike out "with said Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery on the 26th day of August, 1865," and insert "of the military service of the United States on the 23d day of July, 1864."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In order that we may finish up in the House the work which has been done by the Committee of the Whole, I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion until this bill has been disposed of.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like very much to oblige the gentleman, but I do not think the bill can be disposed of without debate.

Mr. BAYNE. It was passed in the last House without a single word of objection. I think there will be no debate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If there is to be no debate on the bill, I have no objection to having the vote taken.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STEELE. Is it proposed to report this bill favorably without any debate? It seems to me the bill should be discussed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with the recommendation that they be passed with or without amendment respectively.

LOUISA BODDY.

The SPEAKER. The first bill in order is one reported from the Committee of the Whole House on last Friday. The title will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a recommendation that it be passed with an amendment. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I move the previous question upon agreeing to the amendment and ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. This bill is identical in its provisions with Senate bill 271, which has been passed by the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside and that the Senate bill be taken up for consideration in its place.

Mr. COBB. I object.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, there being—ayes 82, noes 4.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. GEORGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BAYNE. If we adjourn we dispense with the evening session for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, and move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The motion of Mr. NICHOLLS was not agreed to.

INCREASED PENSIONS FOR SOLDIERS OF 1812.

Mr. RANDALL. I hold in my hand a petition from surviving soldiers of the war of 1812. It is written by one of these soldiers who is now over 90 years of age. I ask unanimous consent to present this petition, which is for increase of pensions; and as with the names it will not probably occupy more than a dozen lines, I ask consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the following petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

We, the undersigned, pensioners of the war of 1812, met at Independence Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, on the 22d day of February, 1884, beg leave to represent to both Houses of Congress that the number who actually served and are pensioned at $8 per month is very small, "all are very old, most are poor and helpless." We pray Congress to increase our pensions liberally to aid us in the trials of old age; and, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

T. B. DANACH,
E. B. REGISTER,
ELI ELDRIDGE,
DAVID CLOUD,
HENRY GARRICK,
GEO. M. O'DONNELL,
JOHN STALLMAN,
ZALMON LUDINGTON,
ELHANON OMERSETTER,
JOSEPH BUCK, and others.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WATSON. I move that the House take a recess, to meet this evening under the standing order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn, which takes precedence.

Mr. BEACH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question recurred on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 84.

So the House refused to adjourn.

GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The next business is the bill (H. R. 4682) granting a pension to Ward B. Burnett, reported Friday evening last.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. On ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the House, so that they may vote knowing what this bill is, that General Ward B. Burnett is now drawing a pension of $72 a month, the highest pension under the general law paid to anybody. This bill increases his pension to $100. That is all, and I wish the House to understand it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish to say a word or two, and shall not detain the House but for a word or two. General Burnett is the oldest living graduate of West Point. He was presented by the votes of the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war with the box left by General Jackson to be given by the votes of the soldiers to the man who proved himself to be the bravest in the next war. The comrades of General Burnett voted him that box, which he still retains.

He was receiving a pension of $72 a month under the general law and $50 under a special law passed for his benefit, making $122 in all a month. Notwithstanding the Attorney-General again and again gave his opinion both those pensions were legal it was overruled, and the pension of $50 was taken away, or rather he resigned it under compulsion.

We considered this bill in Committee on Pensions. I was in favor of giving a pension of $125 a month to this brave soldier, or $3 more than he had received, but the committee determined to report a bill giving $100.

But I will not trespass on the patience of the House further than to say I trust this House will not go back on the gallant old general whom my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], whom I saw a moment ago, proposed a few days since to put in the place of Fitz-John Porter and retire him as brigadier-general. I beg the House not to go back on the Committee on Pensions, which reported this bill for a pension of $100.

Mr. STEELE. That was on the principle: "Of two evils choose the least."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Under the general law he was receiving $30 a month seven or eight years ago, and Congress was asked to increase it to $50, and it was done. After that he became totally blind, and then under the general law he was entitled to $72, and that pension was granted to him, and in addition for a few years he drew $50 under a special act. But Congress in the mean while passed a general law which prohibited the drawing of two pensions, one under the general law and one under a special law, compelling the pensioner to select the one he would retain. The consequence was that General Burnett lost his special pension of $50 a month, he declining to take under the special and choosing to take under the general law.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I could not hear the gentleman's statement. What is he drawing under the present law?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He is drawing under the general law $72 a month, the highest pension given to anybody.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What reason is given for asking for this increase.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman will find it in the report prepared by my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON]. It is based on his long and faithful service to his country and on the fact he is totally blind.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will ask my friend, the chairman of the committee, if we did not unanimously agree in the committee on this increase.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am inclined to think that that was the action of the committee; but, as far as I was concerned, as a kind of compromise. There is no minority report, it is true; but I will state I believe that $100 was voted on my own motion, and it is only proper that I should say it was because I was not willing to give $125. I saw that sum was likely to pass, and I therefore preferred $100 to $125. But I think, as I thought then, that $72 is enough.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not go back upon his former position and vote against the bill in its present shape.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, a question was asked by the gentleman from Ohio of the gentleman from Alabama with reference to the circumstances of this aged veteran, and I was very much in hopes that the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] would have answered the question and stated to this House and to the country the exact facts of the case. I have not myself kept the facts clearly in mind, with a view to making a statement to the House, but if I remember correctly the statement of the gentleman from New York was in substance this: that this gallant old soldier is now totally blind, and living here at some place in Washington, dependent upon his little pension of $72 a month for his support. His circumstances and condition are such as appeal to the manly and humane consideration of every fair-minded man in this House; and I believe that justice will hardly be done him by the passage of this act. The amount ought to be larger.

Mr. Speaker, the record of this man as a soldier is the most magnificent, if I may be permitted to use the term, and I say it without disparagement to our other gallant soldiers, of any of the soldiers of the Mexican war. It is one of the most magnificent records that is presented by any soldier we have ever had. And now, after many years of service to his country, he is old, feeble, blind, helpless, and he asks this little pittance at the hands of this great, magnificent country that he served so gallantly and served so well. I say, let us give it to him. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 30.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John D. Monteith, deceased.

Mr. GEORGE. I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEORGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with a favorable recommendation, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

The bill (H. R. 328) for the relief of John P. T. Davis;

A bill (H. R. 1198) for the relief of John Taylor & Son; and

A bill (H. R. 3521) for the relief of Benjamin D. Lakin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There is another bill reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House. Does the gentleman insist upon the motion?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3522) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix; reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

Mr. GEDDES. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. GEDDES. I demand the yeas and nays on the bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

SIDNEY HENDERSON, EXECUTRIX.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the bill (H. R. 3522) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix, reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GEDDES. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEDDES. I wish to say that this amendment was not proposed by the Committee on War Claims, but it is an amendment proposed to the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It was proposed by the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and so reported to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I would like to hear the amendment again read.

The SPEAKER. The bill and amendment will be read.

The bill and amendment were again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 97, not voting 120; as follows:

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire.

Mr. BISBEE with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. REED with Mr. HAMMOND.

Mr. HART. I have been announced as paired. I am paired on political questions, but not regarding this as a political question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to state that if that motion is voted down I will move that the House take a recess.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 40, noes 73.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock; the business at the evening session being the consideration of pension bills, in pursuance of the order of the House made on the 18th ultimo.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote, the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will occupy the chair during the evening session.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order of the House under which the session of this evening is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. BENNETT. I rise to make an inquiry. It may be a question of privilege, and I will put it in that shape. I would like to know the reason for keeping the door to this wing of the Capitol looking directly west shut during night sessions. If it is in accordance with a rule to be observed here, I should conform to it. If, however, it is a matter within the control of this House, I desire to have the benefit of that entrance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair knows of no rule on the subject, but it is customary to keep that door closed during evening sessions.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask the Chair by what means I can get a solution of that matter; whether there is any way in which I can bring the attention of the House to it more pointedly or more obtrusively. I want that door opened. If the Chair will indicate how I can get at it, I will have it done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a question under the control of the Speaker and the Architect of the Capitol, and under them of the police of the Capitol.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to submit a motion, if in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to inform the gentleman that nothing is in order at this session of the House under the order of the House except the consideration of pension claims.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I will bring it up at some time when I will be in order.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering pension bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering pension bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3026) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that that bill and the next pension bill on the Calendar, the bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee, the consideration of which at the last night session resulted in the demand for a quorum, shall be informally passed over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHARLOTTE DAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4706) for the relief of Charlotte Day.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charlotte Day, mother of Charles E. Day, formerly of Company F, First New Jersey Militia (Pennsylvania Emergency).

Mr. CRISP. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 3308, beg leave to report as a substitute therefor the bill H. R. 4706, and submit the following report:

The evidence in this case shows that Charles E. Day was a private in Company F, First Regiment New Jersey Militia (Pennsylvania Emergency), and the certificate of the adjutant-general of the State of New Jersey states that he was enrolled on the 28th day of June, 1863, and was mustered into the service of the United States for thirty days from that date, and honorably discharged August 1, 1863, but this fact is not shown on the rolls in the Adjutant-General's Office at Washington. He contracted disease while in the service that caused his death September 16, 1863, aged 21 years. He was the main support of his mother, she being a widow. Her claim was rejected on the ground that the soldier, being a State militiaman, and not mustered into the service of the United States, and the mother's claim not being prosecuted prior to July 4, 1874, she is not entitled to a pension under the law. The mother is advanced in age, verging on 65 years, and is in very destitute circumstances, relying principally upon the charity of neighbors for her support. As the prop of her declining years has been taken from her by the Government, to whose rescue this young man rushed in an emergency, it is proper that she should be recompensed for the loss, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LOUISA V. DE KILPATRICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, and pay her the pension of the widow of a brigadier-general of the United States Army.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4707) for the relief of Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Judson Kilpatrick, late captain of Company H, Fifth New York Volunteers, and brigadier-general United States Volunteers, and more recently minister to Chili, appeals to the Government of the United States for a pension for the death of her husband, which, it is alleged, was produced by wounds received in the service of the United States in the late war. That General Kilpatrick did receive severe wounds in said service is abundantly set forth and proven by Adjutant Q. Owen Moore, who was present at the battle of Big Bethel, Va., and saw General Kilpatrick at the time he was wounded in the right thigh, and present when the wound was dressed; and also by Capt. R. M. A. Hawk, of the Ninety-second Illinois Volunteers, and Surgeon Clinton Helm, who were present at the battle of Resaca, Ga., when General Kilpatrick received a gunshot wound through upper part of left thigh, and saw him carried from the field, pale and bleeding.

The papers in the Pension Office show that the soldier was mustered in as captain May 9, 1861, and appointed brigadier-general June 18, 1863, and was discharged January 1, 1866; and that he was pensioned for gunshot wounds of both thighs, received in 1861 and 1864. He died December 2, 1881, of Bright's disease of the kidneys. The widow filed her claim for pension August 8, 1882, alleging that the death of her husband was caused by the wounds for which he was pensioned. The claim was rejected on the ground that the fatal disease was not contracted in the service or in the line of duty. The marriage certificate and the certificates of baptism of the two children are duly proven by certified copies of the public records of Santiago, Chili, where General Kilpatrick died. To rebut the position taken by the Pension Office that General Kilpatrick did not die of the wounds received in the service and in the line of duty, we have the evidence of Saldiar, Herman Schneider, Felix Gerbout, and Puelmatupper, all physicians of Santiago, who certify substantially as follows:

"That the general was suffering from an inflammation of the kidneys, which disease was the result of the hardships experienced during the late war, and also of wounds received in the years of 1860 and 1861, finally resulting in his death."

The Pension Office officials, however, with that care which is deserving of commendation, say:

"That that portion of the certificates executed in Santiago which sets forth the hardships and exposure of the service of the deceased as contributing causes of the fatal disease can not be regarded as of much weight, and that this naked statement was made by physicians more than fifteen years after the close of the war."

This assumption by the Pension Office of the probability of an error by the affiant physicians in their conclusions as to the cause of death, while it may be a protection to the Government as against erroneous opinions on the part of attending physicians, does not affect the minds of your committee to that extent that it is willing to discard the evidence, but, on the contrary, to give it credence, that the doubt, if any, may be awarded to the claimant's benefit.

This widow has two children, not yet of age, dependent upon her for support. Her husband, endeared to her by many noble qualities, no doubt, and who occupies a large page in the history of his country, and whose eminent services and brave deeds have rendered his name illustrious, is dead from the wounds received in his country's cause. The children are fatherless. There should be some substantial recompense for the widow and children of this dead hero. Acting Commissioner C. B. Walker, of the Pension Bureau, in a letter dated January 24, 1884, addressed to Congress, pursuant to a joint resolution of Congress approved May 29, 1830, says:

"I submit the claim to your consideration with my opinion that relief should be granted by special act of Congress."

This from the bureau, after rejecting the claim because of its not coming within the purview of the law, satisfies your committee, with the other evidence printed, that it possesses great merit, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying House bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions what rate of pension is granted by this bill?

Mr. MATSON. This bill provides for granting a pension in this case under the general law, which provides for a pension of $30 per month.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARTHA M. B. M'CULLACH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1411) granting a pension to Martha M. B. McCullach, of Freeport, Pa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha M. B. McCullach, widow of Dr. William P. McCullach, or McCollough, who was assistant surgeon in the Seventy-eighth Regiment of the Pennsylvania Volunteers in the late war, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1411) granting a pension to Martha M. B. McCullach, of Freeport, Pa., has had the same under consideration and beg leave to report as follows:

That Martha M. B. McCullach, the petitioner, is the widow of Dr. William P. McCullach, or McCollough, who was assistant surgeon in the Seventy-eighth Regiment of the Pennsylvania Volunteers in the late war.

We, the committee, find from numerous affidavits, of undoubted character, that Dr. William P. McCullach, while not enrolled as assistant surgeon of the Seventy-eighth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, acted as assistant surgeon, by request, from about August 1, 1861, and that he enlisted as a private; and from the report of the Adjutant-General's Office he was enrolled as assistant surgeon Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers to date April 11, 1863, to serve three years or during the war, on the muster-roll, field and staff, of that regiment, and he was mustered out with field and staff November 4, 1864; and that he died September 17, 1867, from disease contracted in the Army while in the line of his duty, as shown by the affidavit of Dr. C. B. Gillespie, who attended him in his last sickness; and of Dr. O. P. Bollinger's sworn testimony, that when Dr. William P. McCullach returned from the Army, in the fall of 1864, he, the said Dr. William P. McCullach, had chronic diarrhea, which continued during the remainder of his life, and that he consulted this deponent at different times in relation to his disease, and that he has no hesitation in saying that Dr. William P. McCullach died from the diarrhea contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of his duty.

Also have the affidavit of Dr. William S. Hosack, who was physician for the Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and that he was with Dr. William P. McCullach until the regiment was discharged in the fall of 1864, and that when Dr. William P. McCullach first became connected with the regiment he was a stout, healthy man, free from all disease, and noted for his temperate habits in every respect; and that while in the line of his duty he had an attack of enteritis, after which he took an acute attack of diarrhea, which baffled all treatment and ran on into a chronic form, which he had every reason to believe was the primary cause of his death, and that his disease was contracted in the service of the United States.

The committee have also the affidavits of Col. William Sirwell, of the Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and several privates of said Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. All unite in giving the said Dr. William P. McCullach a very good record in the service, and the cause of his death was from disease contracted while in the service of the United States. The committee also have the letter of Hon. J. Mosgrove and others, who are acquainted with applicant and the justice of the claim, and recommend it as being meritorious, as the widow, Martha M. B. McCullach, is poor and in need of the means of support in her declining years.

The committee think the case is deserving, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, which is herewith reported to the House.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CORNELIA A. SCHULTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1428) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Schultz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Cornelia A. Schultz, and pay the said Cornelia A. Schultz a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1428) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Schultz, adopt the following report:

That the claimant is a single woman, aged 57 years, and has resided in Gettysburg, Pa., over forty years. She is in a helpless condition, owing to delicate health, the result of a severe surgical operation. Her ancestors have rendered valuable and heroic service to the Government in nearly all of its wars. Her brother, David A. Schultz, late major of the Seventy-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, died from wounds received in the battle of Chancellorsville. At the time of his death this sister depended mainly upon the said brother for her support. This claimant's home was almost destroyed in the battle of Gettysburg, situated in the very midst of that battle. Since her said brother's death, which occurred on the 23d day of May, 1873, she has lived upon money raised by mortgaging her home, which is now mortgaged to about its value. Neither she nor any one else has been indemnified in any way for the damage done to the house by the battle of Gettysburg. She is now driven by extreme poverty to apply for the continuance of her said brother's pension. The above facts are verified by many distinguished and well-known citizens of Pennsylvania.

In view of the extraordinary circumstances the committee have determ ned to report favorably, and recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY E. MURRAY.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 1433) granting a pension to Mary E. Murray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary E. Murray, daughter of the late Col. William G. Murray, of the Eighty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1433, submit the following report:

This bill was before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-seventh Congress, to whom the subject was referred, and favorably considered. The bill passed the House, but action was not had on it in the Senate. The report of the House Committee of the Forty-seventh Congress we now append and adopt as our own:

Mary E. Murray is the invalid daughter of Col. William G. Murray, of the Eighty-fourth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, who fell at the head of his command at the battle of Winchester, Va., March 23, 1862. Colonel Murray was also a gallant soldier of the Mexican war.

Before the committee are petitions signed by a great number of prominent citizens of Pennsylvania, who say that Miss Murray is a "bright, intelligent young lady, but, owing to physical infirmity, she can not fill a clerical position or serve in any capacity which will enable her to earn a livelihood. She, by the untimely death of her father, was left an orphan, and has ever since been dependent upon relatives and friends."

The petition further shows that Miss Murray was entirely dependent on her said father for support—a father who, if living, would be abundantly able to support her by his energy and industry.

We think this is a case which, if not within the letter of the law granting pensions to infant children under sixteen years of age, is within its spirit. The object of said law was to benefit the helpless offspring of deceased soldiers who lost their lives in the military service of the country. It appears that Miss Murray is helpless, and we report the accompanying bill favorably, with an amendment, namely, striking out the word "thirty," in line 7, and inserting instead the word "eighteen."

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended by striking out "$30" and inserting in lieu thereof "$18."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY ELIZA DICKSON.

The next pension bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1391) granting a pension to Mary Eliza Dickson, widow of Dr. Thomas Dickson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Eliza Dickson, widow of Dr. Thomas Dickson, as if the said Dr. Thomas Dickson had been mustered into the military service of the United States during the war of the rebellion as an assistant surgeon with the rank of captain, and pay her the pension of a widow of an assistant surgeon.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was submitted the bill (H. R. 1391) granting a pension to Mary Eliza Dickson, widow of Dr. Thomas Dickson, respectfully report:

That the evidence shows that Dr. Thomas Dickson was surgeon and physician of high standing of the city of Pittsburgh, Pa.; that early in July, 1862, in response to a call from the Government of the United States for volunteer surgeons, Dr. Dickson went to Harrison's Landing, Va., and that there and on the transports or hospital boats which carried the sick and wounded from Harrison's Landing to Washington he gave his best skill and attention to the sick and wounded, having been placed in charge of a large number in consequence of his well-known qualifications for the work. In the language of a letter written to his daughter from Washington, D. C., while in the discharge of his patriotic duty, Dr. Dickson said:

"I have just arrived here on board the steamer Commodore, on which I had a ward of wounded soldiers. We had over five hundred on board. I had two hundred and forty-seven in my ward. I had four assistants. I am nearly tired out, but think I must go back again. The medical director has just called to see if I will not return with him."

The testimony of Dr. John Dickson, a brother of the deceased, and Dr. James McCann, both of whom were in close and intimate relations with the deceased, shows that when he started from Pittsburgh to render the services mentioned he was robust and vigorous beyond most men. He remained on duty about two weeks, and finding that his health was suffering, he returned to his home at Pittsburgh the latter part of July quite ill. In the words of Dr. McCann, who was one of his attending physicians—

"He continued to grow worse from and after the date of his return; that he suffered from typho-malarial or camp fever; that he died from the effects of the said typho or malarial or camp fever on the 3d day of August, 1862, about twelve days after his return to the city of Pittsburgh, and fourteen days after leaving the sick and wounded in Virginia."

Dr. McCann declares that, in his opinion, the death of Dr. Dickson was caused by exposure while engaged in nursing and caring for the sick and wounded soldiers of the United States. James Allison, D. D., the editor and proprietor of the Presbyterian Banner, published at Pittsburgh, accompanied Dr. Dickson and other surgeons on the greater part of the trip, and he details at length the valuable and important services rendered by Dr. Dickson. Dr. Allison assisted, as best he could, and he closes his statement in these words:

"Believe me when I say that Dr. Dickson died as really in the service of his country as if he had fallen on the field of battle. * * * I may also say that I am fully persuaded that the lives of a large number of soldiers were saved by his skill and unremitting attention."

Dr. Dickson was cut off in the prime of life. He left a widow and two children without means, and the widow, now well advanced in life, needs the aid which her husband would have doubtless provided for her had he lived.

The committee, in view of all the facts, report the bill back with a recommendation that it do pass as amended, the amendment being indicated in the bill hereto attached.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended by striking all out after the words "Dr. Thomas Dickson," where they first occur, to the end of the bill, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and pay her the pension of a widow of an assistant surgeon."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. SARAH BRYAN LEET.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2608) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet, widow of George K. Leet, late a major and assistant adjutant-general in the United States Army, with such rate of pension as her said husband would have been entitled to for disability incurred in the service of the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2608) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

That Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet is the widow of George K. Leet, late a major and assistant adjutant-general in the United States Army.

The report of the Adjutant-General shows continuous service of George K. Leet from August 29, 1862, to March 4, 1869, most of the time in the responsible position of assistant adjutant-general. On August 1, 1870, on his own request, he was honorably discharged.

The evidence shows that when George K. Leet enlisted he was in excellent physical condition, having been an active athlete in a Chicago gymnasium, as shown by affidavit of Gardner G. Willard and C. Higby. It also appears from the evidence that in 1862, while in camp near Vicksburg, G. K. Leet had contracted the disease of camp diarrhea and erysipelas, and continued to suffer therefrom, the disease having become chronic.

Also affidavits of G. G. Willard, Sidney C. Higby, Mrs. Sarah B. Leet, and Mrs. M. Leet.

It also appears from sworn testimony of Henry D. Burwell that G. K. Leet continued to suffer from chronic diarrhea during the years 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, from the disease contracted while in the service in the field.

Dr. J. B. Griswold testifies that in 1881 G. K. Leet was suffering from, and was treated by witness for, anal fistula, with prolapsus of the rectum, resulting from the chronic diarrhea contracted in the United States Army; that G. K. Leet died from the effects of this disease on March 26, 1881.

The following evidence of Basil Norris, surgeon, United States Army, of date January 23, 1884, is in these words:

"I certify that to the best of my recollection and belief Maj. George K. Leet, assistant adjutant-general, United States Army, suffered from diarrhea recurring from time to time during his service in Washington on the staff of the General of the Army from the autumn of 1865 to the winter of 1868; that I occasionally prescribed for him for this disease."

It is also proven that George K. Leet left surviving him his widow, Sarah Bryan Leet, the claimant, and five minor children, dependent upon her for support, she having no means except her daily earnings.

The committee believe this to be a meritorious case, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 2608) with an amendment as indicated in the bill hereto attached.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended so as to read:

Place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet, widow of George K. Leet, late a private in Cooley's Independent Battery.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MERRITT LEWIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 819) granting an increase of pension to Merritt Lewis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase to the first grade, namely, $50 per month, the pension now granted to Merritt Lewis by certificate No. 33631.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 819), and accompanying papers, granting an increase of pension to Merritt Lewis, have considered the same, and report:

It appears that Merritt Lewis, a disabled soldier of the late war, enlisted at Grand Rapids, Mich., in January, 1863, in Company K, Seventh Michigan Cavalry, and on the 3d day of July following, at the battle of Gettysburg, received a gunshot wound, by reason of which his right leg was amputated above the knee, and subsequently a second amputation was performed. That in the spring of 1864, while in Camden-street Hospital, Baltimore, he lost his hearing, caused by scarlet fever, and from that time has been and is now totally deaf in both ears, as appears by the affidavits of George E. Ranney, late surgeon Second Michigan Cavalry, and Julius A. Post, late medical cadet, United States Army, and in consequence of said deafness, as further appears by said affidavits, he has partially lost the power of speech.

That by reason of said disabilities he was honorably discharged June 3, 1864, and by special act of Congress, June 16, 1882, was granted a pension of $37.50 per month, as shown by pension certificate No. 33361.

An application by said Merritt Lewis for an increase of pension has been denied on the ground that his pension, being fixed by "special act," can not be increased except by further legislation.

In consideration of the fact that the total loss of hearing and partial loss of speech, combined with loss of leg, is equal to if not greater disability than the loss of both feet, and, further, that the merit and justice of his case is vouched by the governor, the adjutant-general, and other State officers of Michigan, therefore your committee are of the opinion that the increase of pension should be granted as asked for, and recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to inquire in what class this case would fall under the general law? It seems to me the question of fact would indicate the class.

Mr. MATSON. The trouble about the case is that the rate of pension for this person was fixed by a special act of Congress. The law provides that where a person receives a pension the rate of which is fixed by special act it can not be increased under the general law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not if the general law would give a higher pension?

Mr. MATSON. No; that is the law.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOSEPH L. CALDWELL.

The next busines on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 554) granting a pension to Joseph L. Caldwell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Joseph L. Caldwell, late of Company G, Sixty-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 554, respectfully submit the following report:

That they find that Joseph T. Caldwell was enrolled a member of Company G, Sixty-ninth Regiment of Missouri Enrolled Militia, and was honorably discharged November 15, 1864. His record as a soldier is good. On the 25th day of September, 1864, in an action with the rebels at or near Chambersburg, in Missouri, his horse was shot under him and fell upon him, and that the horse of a comrade also fell on him. That his left great toe was broken and lacerated; that his left ankle was dislocated or fractured; that his right leg was badly bruised, and that he was bruised in the region of his left kidney; that he has been ever since receiving the injury, and is now, incapacitated from performing manual labor. This case was rejected in the Pension Department under the provisons of the third paragraph of section 4693 Revised Statutes, the claim not having been filed until March 20, 1879. In view of the fact that the testimony is clear that his record as a soldier was good, that he received the injuries in line of duty and while actually engaged in battle, we recommend the passage of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended so as to read "Joseph T. Caldwell" instead of Joseph L. "Caldwell;" also amend the title to correspond.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

H. E. VAN TREES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 562) granting a pension to H. E. Van Trees.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of H. E. Van Trees, late a first lieutenant in the Kansas volunteer militia.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 562) granting a pension to H. E. Van Trees, submit the following report:

We find that H. E. Van Trees was enrolled in Kansas State militia by governor of Kansas on the 3d day of September, 1874, and on the 23d day of December, 1874, was mustered into service as first lieutenant, and ordered at once into active service to repel an Indian invasion in Western Kansas. On the 8th of January, 1875, while the command was in active service, Lieutenant Trees was ordered to proceed to Hutchinson for supplies. While on the way they were overtaken by a terrible snow-storm, and Van Trees was so severely frozen as to render necessary the amputation of both his feet at the instep, rendering him a cripple for life.

Van Trees had previously served during the war of the rebellion, and distinguished himself by his brave and gallant conduct.

There being no doubt as to the facts in the case, the committee would recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

W. H. BLAKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 591) granting a pension to W. H. Blake.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of W. H. Blake, late a private in the Sixty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; said pension to commence from the date when his name was dropped from the roll.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 591) granting a pension to W. H. Blake, submit the following report:

We find that the claimant enlisted October 5, 1861. That in an action at Mount Zion, December 28, 1861, he received a slight wound in his shoulder. December 29, 1863, he was remustered as a veteran at Pulaski, Tenn. The veterans of his company were furloughed January 28, 1864, with orders to report at Joliet February 28, 1864. That on his way returning to his regiment he was accidentally shot in his left foot by the discharge of his gun. The evidence shows that his company were armed with Henry rifles, purchased by themselves. The only question in this case is whether he was at the time in the line of his duty. Taking into consideration the fact that he had served his country faithfully for more than two years, had been once wounded in action, and had voluntarily re-enlisted as a veteran, we think the technical question should be waived, and we therefore report the bill with the recommendation that it be passed, with an amendment striking out all after "volunteers," in the seventh line.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "said pension to commence from the date when his name was dropped from the roll."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill as amended to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not understand why the applicant in this case can not obtain his pension through the regular channel. I fail to discover in the report what there is in this case which requires a special act, or why the pension can not be granted in the Pension Office.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that this case was rejected in the Pension Bureau on the ground that the wound was not received while the person was in the line of duty. The evidence was clear and conclusive that the company to which this man belonged was armed with Henry rifles, purchased by themselves. On their furlough they took these rifles home with them, and when this man was returning from his furlough he was wounded in the left foot by an accidental discharge of his rifle. The Pension Bureau rejected his application for a pension on the ground that he was not wounded while in the line of duty.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I know myself a number of such cases as this. I know one case where a soldier on furlough, while on his way back to his regiment, lost a limb by an accident on the cars. There is quite a numerous class of cases of that kind. It seems to me that if it is proposed to change the rule and admit such cases as this to the pension-roll we ought to do it in such a way as will admit all cases of this class. I feel as though we were doing injustice to others every time that we single out a particular case from a class and grant a pension in that case while denying it to others of the same class.

Mr. MATSON. In reply to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has said upon this subject, I have to say that the only safe general rule in relation to granting pensions which the Government can adopt is to require that those only shall be pensioned who incur the injury or disease for which a pension is granted while in the line of duty. It would be unsafe for the Government to adopt any other general rule, because that would open the door to granting pensions for any injury which the soldier might receive at a time when he was not only out of the line of duty but perhaps engaged in some wrongful act.

Therefore I say that the Government must stand by some general rule, and insist that the injury for which the soldier is to receive a pension must have been incurred while in the line of duty. But to all general rules there must be particular exceptions. When we make those exceptions all the circumstances of the case should be taken into consideration, the length of service, the kind of soldier, the habits of the man, and all that goes to make up a meritorious and equitable claim in his behalf.

The facts in this case seem to be that this soldier served more than two years, was once wounded in battle, though perhaps not sufficiently to entitle him to a pension, and that he re-enlisted. While returning from his home to his regiment, being armed with a Henry rifle purchased by himself, as he had a right to be armed, this accident occurred. The committee thought the circumstances of the case were such as should make this an exception to the general rule. This man was a faithful soldier, had served well, and the accident happened while he was handling a rifle which he was taking back with him into the service. The committee therefore determined to report this bill favorably, regarding this as an exceptional case.

Mr. PARKER. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] whether this soldier at the time the injury was received was in the neighborhood of the enemy?

Mr. MATSON. I can not state the precise place. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] can no doubt give that information. But the soldier was going in the direction of military operations. He was returning from his home to his regiment.

Mr. PARKER. It seems to me that if he was not in proximity to the enemy he is not entitled to a pension under the precedents. The chairman of the committee will no doubt remember a case which came before the committee in the last Congress, where an officer who had lost an arm in the service and had been promoted for gallant conduct was going from Philadelphia to New York to obtain his equipment for future service, and while passing from one car to another was thrown from the train and killed. Physicians and others gave it as their opinion that the loss of his arm rendered the man incapable of steadying himself, and thus contributed to his death. Yet we held in that case, the applicant for a pension being the widow or the sister—I do not now remember which—that the man was not in the line of his duty at the time of his death, and that the case could not be construed as pensionable, and a pension was not granted.

It seems to me that the present case is nearly enough parallel to the one I have just mentioned to come under the same rule. If this man can be shown to have been in the neighborhood of the enemy, he may fairly be construed to have been in service in the line of his duty. But if he was at his home and the injury appears to have had no connection with his service as a soldier, then I submit he ought not to be pensioned.

Mr. MORRILL. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] I desire to say that this man at the time of the injury had left his home and was on his return to his regiment. As the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has so well said, the cases acted upon by us here are special cases—cases that can not be determined fairly by any general rule. Every case that has received the favorable action of the Committee of the Whole this evening has some special features recommending it to our generosity; for a special pension is simply an act of generosity. It comes within no rule. Thus, this evening you have passed in Committee of the Whole a bill to pension an invalid daughter of a man who was in the military service—a woman 25 or 30 years of age, if I recollect aright. In another case the person to receive the pension is the sister of a soldier who was unmarried. These are cases coming within no general rule.

Now, here was a good soldier, who served his country bravely. When his first term of enlistment expired he re-enlisted. Under the general order granting a furlough to soldiers who re-enlisted he visited his home, taking his gun with him, because he had a perfect right to do so, having bought and paid for it with his own money. On his way back to his regiment he slipped upon the ice and received an accidental shot from his gun, disabling him for life. Now, it may appear right to some gentlemen to stand on the technical point that this man was not in the line of duty at the time of the injury; but, sir, as an old soldier I propose to vote to give a pension in every case of this kind. A man who has served his country bravely and faithfully and who has been disabled in this way by an accident is in my judgment clearly entitled to a pension.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the point raised against this bill, that the man was not in the line of his duty at the time of the injury, is not well taken. In my judgment a soldier who has been at home on furlough and is on his way back is then in the military service as much as though actually with his regiment at the time. He is acting under orders. He is marching toward the enemy; his face is in the direction of the enemy. Perhaps if this accident had happened while the man was at home it might properly be held that he was not in the line of his duty because he was then at the place where he had asked to be, but when returning he is under the orders of his officer; and if an accident happens to him at such a time he is pensionable, it seems to me, in precisely the same degree as though the accident had happened upon the field of battle or in the camp.

Mr. PARKER. Would the gentleman make a distinction between the case where a man was going toward his home at the time of the accident and a case where he was returning from his home?

Mr. NUTTING. That would not be a legal point.

Mr. PARKER. I did not know but that the gentleman would make such a distinction.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I thought it important to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this case, because it seemed to me to be a departure from the rule which has heretofore prevailed and from the principle laid down in our pension laws. This is hardly a special case, but is one of a class now excluded from the benefit of the pension laws. The principle upon which pensions are granted for disability is that the disability should have been incurred in the service and in the line of duty.

There is a difference between disability thus incurred and disability incurred while the soldier is away at home on a furlough or returning from furlough. There he is his own master. He acts on his own motion. He is not under the orders of an officer. He is not compelled to do this or to do that. Hence the distinction made in the law.

I am not arguing that the law ought not to be modified so as to admit a class who have suffered disability on account of wounds. There may be a class of that kind who ought to come in. But I still think it is not good policy to single out one from one hundred, five hundred, or one thousand, and make that a special case here. But if this House, if this Congress decides to extend the provisions of the pension laws to that class of disability, then we ought to modify the law and let in the whole class, and not by piecemeal in this way pension a few while we leave many more just as deserving to go without their pension.

Mr. HOUK. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if this House narrows itself down to the restriction proposed by the gentleman from Ohio we might as well stop legislating on these claims of individuals. Why are we called to act on any case? Simply because of some technical reason excluding it from the direct letter of the general law. Then the power of the House in its legislative character is invoked to do justice in that particular case, not because it is legal, for if it were the Pension Office would allow it, but because it is right, equitable, and just.

It seems to me whenever a pension case is presented for our consideration, the question we should address to ourselves is how, under what circumstances, was the disability incurred, on what is it founded? Take this case: Is it not proved according to the report and the statements made that this man had absolutely dedicated his service to the Government of the United States? I do not care whether he was going to or coming from home; he was taking the necessary steps to put himself on the field of battle in defense of the flag. He was in the discharge of the active duties of a soldier. He was wounded while doing all in his power, not only in one enlistment, but in a second enlistment dedicating himself to the country, marching in this instance directly toward the front.

I wish to emphasize what I tried to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, that this House does not sit as a court bound by technical rules, confined to the letter of the general law, but to judge from the facts and to do substantial justice in each case to the soldier who was in the military service and in active discharge of his duty.

For that reason I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Do it to all, those not having friends here as well as those who have special friends on the floor.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

M. H. CLEMENTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 570) granting a pension to M. H. Clements.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of M. H. Clements, late a private in the Kansas volunteer militia.

The report was read, as follows:

We find that M. H. Clements was enrolled on the 3d day of September, 1874, by the governor of Kansas, and on the 23d day of December, 1874, was mustered into the Kansas State militia as private, and ordered at once into active service to repel an Indian invasion. On the 8th day of January, 1875, while the command was in active service, said Clements, with others, was ordered to Hutchinson, Kans., for supplies. On the way they were overtaken by a severe snow-storm, and Clements was so badly frozen as to render necessary the amputation of both legs above the ankle joint. These facts are established by ample and reliable evidence, and your committee would therefore respectfully recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REUBEN MARSHALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Reuben Marshall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Reuben Marshall, late a private in the Kansas volunteer militia.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee find that Reuben Marshall was enrolled on the 3d day of September, 1874, by the governor of Kansas, and mustered into the Kansas State militia as a private on the 23d day of December, 1874, and on the same day was ordered into active service to repel an Indian invasion in Western Kansas. On the 8th of January, 1875, while the command was in active service, said Marshall was ordered to proceed to Hutchinson with others of the company for supplies for the command. On the way they were overtaken by a severe snow-storm, and he was so badly frozen as to render amputation of both legs above the ankle joints necessary. The index finger of the left hand was also amputated. The committee would therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL TITLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2372) granting a pension to Michael Titler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Titler, late a private in Company B, Twenty-fourth Missouri Infantry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

That said Titler enlisted in Company B, Twenty-fourth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, on the 20th day of August, 1861, being then 48 years of age; that during the battle of Pea Ridge, Ark., on the 7th day of March, 1862, a mule team that was frightened by the bursting of a shell ran over said Titler with a wagon, crippling him in thigh, back, and arm.

That he was under medical treatment for over a month after receiving the injuries; that he remained in service until 1864, but he was detailed to drive ambulance, being incapacitated to march or do duty; that after expiration of term of service he worked at his trade (plasterer) part of the time, and suffered more or less from the injuries aforesaid, one-third of the time being totally unable to work; that in 1879 he made application for pension, which was rejected; that he is now more than 70 years of age, totally unable to work, almost entirely helpless, and without a dollar in the world.

Your committee therefore recommend that he be placed on pension-roll, and receive pension under the laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MOSES FULLINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4708) granting a pension to Moses Fullington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Moses Fullington, a soldier of the war of 1812.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the proofs in support of the claim of Moses Fullington, having had the same under consideration, adopt as their report the report on the same subject of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions of the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, which is as follows:

It is in evidence that on the 2d of May, 1878, the claimant filed an application for pension in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, declaring that he served as a private in the company commanded by Capt. David Chadwick, Colonel Dixon's regiment, of the brigade commanded by Brig. Gen. Elias Fassett, Vermont militia, war 1812. That he entered the service at Cambridge, Vt., September 15, 1813, and remained therein for a period of seventeen days, at which time he was honorably discharged, by a verbal order, at Cumberland Head. That he entered the service as a substitute for his father, Ephraim Fullington, who was drafted.

On the 10th day of October, 1878, the Third Auditor returned the information to the Commissioner of Pensions that "no rolls of Capt. David Chadwick's company of Vermont militia on file in this office."

On the 19th of November, 1878, the said application of Moses Fullington was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions, "on the ground that there is no record of the service of the company in which service is alleged."

To establish said service, outside of the record, the claimant produces the following testimony:

1. Affidavits of Dexter Whiting, aged 74 years, and Samuel B. Waters, aged 86 years, residents of the same town as claimant, declare an acquaintance with the claimant of forty-six years' standing, and that from common report they have always believed that he was a soldier of the war of 1812, in Capt. David Chadwick's company of Vermont militia.

2. Affidavit of Nancy Brush, dated the 4th day of June, 1878, deposing that the said Nancy Brush is 74 years of age; that she is the daughter of Ephraim Fullington, and sister of Moses Fullington, the claimant; that she distinctly recollects many of the circumstances connected with the entrance of her brother into the Army during the war of 1812; that her father was twice drafted, the second time during the year 1813; that she was at home continuously during the said war; that her father and Capt. David Chadwick were near neighbors, living on the same highway on adjoining farms; that Captain Chadwick offered to accept her brother Moses as a substitute for her father; that she distinctly remembers seeing the accouterments of her brother when about starting, of watching him as he passed to the roadway through the room, where she afterward gave way to her emotions; that her impression has always been that he continued in the service nearly three weeks, and that they heard from him several times by mail during his absence.

3. The affidavit of Mrs. Rosamond Carlton, dated June 1, 1878, deposes that she is 79 years of age, and is the daughter of Capt. David Chadwick; that she distinctly recollects that Moses Fullington, eldest son of Ephraim Fullington, was accepted by her father as a substitute for his father in the company commanded by her father, forming a part of the regiment commanded by Colonel Dixon, Vermont militia; that she distinctly recollects the fact of Moses Fullington coming into her father's house on the morning of the march, which was in the fall of 1813; that her father was absent from home with his company, she believes, nearly three weeks; that she is well acquainted with Nancy Brush, formerly Nancy Fullington, a sister of Moses Fullington.

From this, and other evidence, not sworn to, the committee are of the opinion that the said Moses Fullington has satisfactorily established his period of service to have been of sufficient length to entitle him to a pension under the act of March 9, 1878.

The committee return the accompanying bill to the House and recommend the passage of the same.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. CUMMINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 314) for the relief of John W. Cummins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to place the name of John W. Cummins, late a first lieutenant of Company C, Thirty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $20 per month, subject in other respects to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States, to commence on the —— day of April, 1865.

The report was read, as follows:

John W. Cummins was first lieutenant of Company C, Thirty-fifth Indiana Volunteers; that while on the march with General Buell's forces from Murfreesborough, Tenn., to Louisville, Ky., in 1863, and in the line of duty, he was attacked by epilepsy, from the effects of which he was compelled to resign on the 24th day of March, 1863. At this time he was given a certificate of disability by one of the surgeons of his regiment stating that he had incurred this disease, and that if he remained in the military service it would result in the loss of his mind. This disability is shown by neighbors and some of the physicians who have since prescribed for him to continue, and to be of such a character as at times to impair his mind and disqualify him from earning his living by manual labor.

The physician who treated him for a considerable portion of the time since his discharge has died, and during that period he can not produce medical testimony. The author of this bill, Hon. WILLIAM H. CALKINS, of Indiana, assures the committee that he presented these facts to the officers of the Pension Bureau, who stated that on account of this technicality a pension could not be obtained through the regular channels.

This case is urged by the adjutant-general of Indiana, by a large number of the former comrades of Lieutenant Cummins, as well as by a number of well-known prominent citizens of his portion of that State; and in view of these facts this committee has determined to recommend the passage of said bill, with the following amendments: Strike out all after the words "pension-roll," in line 6 of said bill, and insert instead these words: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to understand the technical difficulty why under the provisions of the existing law this pension could not have been granted by the Department.

Mr. MATSON. The fact was that the medical testimony necessary could not be produced on account of the death of the physician.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

IRENE BAKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3606) granting a pension to Irene Baker. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Irene Baker, an imbecile daughter of James Baker, late of Company H, Ninety-seventh Indiana Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $25 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

In line 7, after the word "her," insert the words "legally constituted guardian," and strike out of the same line the words "twenty-five" and insert "eighteen."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the report be read.

The report was read. It is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3606) granting a pension to Irene Baker, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

James Baker was a private in Company H, Ninety-seventh Indiana Volunteers, and served his country faithfully as such for the period of three years. He died of disease contracted while in the military service, and his widow was then pensioned. She has since then married again, and all of the soldier's children are now ever sixteen years of age, and no pension is now paid on account of said soldier's death.

Irene Baker is one of the children of said James Baker, and is now about twenty-five years of age. She is a helpless imbecile, and there is no hope of any improvement in her mental condition, as she has been such from her infancy. She has no property and is now an object of charity. The testimony of Hon. William M. Franklin, now on the supreme bench of Indiana, and many other well-known gentlemen in Indiana, has been produced to prove the foregoing facts.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, with the following amendments: Strike out the words "twenty-five," in line 7 of said bill, and insert the word "eighteen;" and in the same line insert the words "legally constituted guardian" after the word "her."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I dislike very much, sir, to rise for the purpose of opposing a pension bill of that kind; but it does seem to me that we must adhere to some principle with reference to this matter of granting pensions or else we will be all at sea. We must pension either for disability, service, or destitution.

Here is a case presented for our consideration where a pension is asked and recommended by the committee on the ground of need, of destitution. Is there anything else in the case? If so, it has not been shown by the report. If we establish a principle here that where an equitable case can be made up like this, if in such cases pensions shall be granted that are purely gratuities, pensions for destitution, for need, why then I am ready to act upon that principle, if it be the will of Congress to establish that as the principle on which pensions are to be granted. But since that is not the principle, I do think it is time that we come to some determination as to the ground upon which pensions are to be granted in the future in this country.

Mr. MATSON was recognized.

Mr. GOFF. Before the gentleman from Ohio takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. MATSON. I will yield for the gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. GOFF. The question I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio is this: if he does not think it ground sufficient for granting the pension in a case like this where the natural protector of the child is shown to have lost his life in the military service of his country? If he were living to-day he himself would protect and support this helpless child. But having given his life to the service of his country, I ask him if he does not think it incumbent upon the Government to stand in his place?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In the case that the gentleman from West Virginia suggests there would be a pension under the law of but $8 a month, and the law is limited to minors in such cases.

Mr. GOFF. I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio as questioning the amount of this pension, but the principle.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Generally the principle. I say that if we are to establish that system, it should be understood on what principle we are granting pensions. If we propose to grant pensions for service, destitution, or need, let us say so, and let it be distinctly understood. Now, the ground on which I stand is that there should be a uniformity in the practice of granting pensions, and if we are to grant a pension in this case or any similar cases we should grant it in all similar cases.

Mr. GOFF. I think we ought to do it in all such cases; but the gentleman seems to argue to the contrary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Because I think pensions should be limited strictly to disability.

Mr. GOFF. Disability?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. To disability alone. We have never departed from that principle but twice in this country, and they were two very bad precedents in my judgment. If we depart from that principle now and open up the doors to granting pensions for service or for destitution in all cases of need where there is any connection with the Army, then we may expect to see our pension-rolls not limited to one hundred millions of dollars annually, but extending to one hundred and fifty millions or over.

Mr. GOFF. Let me ask the gentleman, are there not now thousands of pensioners standing upon the pension-rolls exactly similar to this?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not understand that there are. I understand that pensions have been granted strictly heretofore on account of disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, first to the soldier, then to the widow and to the minor children or heirs. But further I understand that we have not gone beyond that principle excepting in an isolated case here and there where peculiar circumstances seemed to warrant it, and if we attempt to open the pension laws and grant pensions for destitution or for service and without any regard to the length of time or kind of service, then I say we must expect to open up the doors of the Pension Office and increase our pension-rolls beyond what they now are, perhaps far beyond what any gentleman here imagines.

Mr. GOFF. Does not the report in the case show that the soldier lost his health by disease contracted in the service of his country?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The report does show that.

Mr. GOFF. Then that brings it within the rule prevailing in almost all cases where pensions are granted for loss of health or life in the service, does it not?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; for in this case it is more properly a gratuity.

Mr. MATSON. The report shows that the father of this girl lost his life by reason of the service. That is admitted and verified by the Government in granting a pension to his widow after his death. Among a number of children that this soldier left was one helpless imbecile, who was such from her infancy. This pension is for her benefit. She is as much of a child now as she ever was, although she has passed the age of 16 years. The reason why $18 per month is recommended is because that sum is not more than sufficient to take care of such a helpless person. It is precisely the rate fixed in a case here to-night for the child of Colonel Murray, of the Pennsylvania volunteers—precisely the same rate as fixed by the committee in granting the pension to Mary E. Murray. She was not an imbecile, but is a helpless invalid.

Here is a case which certainly appeals to the sympathy and generosity of this Congress as strongly as any case could, where, as I have said, the child now is as much of a child as she ever was, and must remain so as long as she lives.

The proposition of this bill is to give her a pension of $18 a month; not more than enough to take care of her, during the rest of her life. Is it not right to do that thing, when the father by the admissions of the Government gave his life to his country and is no longer here to defend his helpless child?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This case does appeal to our charities and our sympathies, as do all such cases. There is no question about that. But we know there are many just such cases. There is a very large number of them. But I want simply to bring the House to the position that if it is agreed that we shall grant pension in such cases, then we grant pensions on grounds of charity. There is no question about it, it is pure charity; and if we are to grant pensions on that theory, why then let us make it so general that we will admit all like cases.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to say once more for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio that neither the Committee on Invalid Pensions nor this House in attempting to determine upon these special cases can lay down general rules by which to be governed. Each case must stand upon its own merits or fall for the want of merit. It is impossible, I repeat, as my friend from Tennessee suggested a while ago, to lay down any general rule. The very reason why Congress legislates upon these cases is because they are special and no general rules can be applied by which they may be adjudged and governed. While we might in one case refuse a pension, in another case where the facts were similar, perhaps, but not exactly the same, the committee would be inclined to grant one and so would the House. Each case must stand or fall upon the facts it represents; and certainly there are enough facts here to warrant the granting of this pension.

I want to say one word more in relation to this case. As I said, the widow of this soldier is remarried; and the Government has not paid a dollar to anybody on account of this soldier who died on account of his services to the Government. Now the committee ask $18 to be given to the helpless imbecile daughter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

THOMAS WARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4036) to increase the pension of Thomas Ward, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Thomas Ward, a soldier of the Union Army in the late war, to the sum of $50 per month, and such increase to the effect from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Insert in line 5, after the word "Ward," the following: "Late of Company B, Eighty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers."

Strike out of line 6 the word "fifty" and insert "forty."

At the end of line 6 strike out the word "the" and insert the word "take."

So that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Thomas Ward, late of Company B, Eighty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, a soldier of the Union Army in the late war, to the sum of $40 per month, and such increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4036) to increase the pension of Thomas Ward, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This pensioner was wounded in front of Atlanta, Ga., and the left arm was amputated in consequence thereof. On this account he is now receiving a pension of $24 per month. He has proven that at the time he was discharged from the service, and ever since, he was suffered with chronic diarrhea, and that as a result of that disease he has suffered with enlargement of the liver, and paralysis of both legs has resulted, and he can move about now at all times with difficulty and sometimes not at all.

He is now allowed at the Pension Office all that can be given him unless he shows such a condition of total helplessness as to require the constant aid and attendance of another person. His condition is not such all the time, but the greater portion of the time it is.

In view of the foregoing facts, well established by the evidence of physicians who are attending him, as well as by other reputable testimony, this committee recommend the passage of said bill with the following amendments: Strike out the word "fifty," in line 6 of said bill, and insert instead thereof the word "forty;" and, after the word "Ward," in line 5 of said bill, insert the words "late of Company B, Eighty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers;" and, in line 6 of said bill, strike out the word "the" and insert instead thereof the word "take."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY P. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1394) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary P. Thompson, widow of James B. Thompson, late captain of Company F, One hundred and ninetieth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1394) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson, having considered the same, respectfully reports:

That a bill granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson was favorably reported to the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, and was passed in the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress. Your committee adopts the report made to the Forty-seventh Congress in this case as representing its views and recommendations, namely:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1519) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson, having considered the same, respectfully report the following statement of facts and conclusions presented by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-sixth Congress, in this case, as embodying the views of the committee, to wit:

That Mary P. Thompson, the petitioner, is the widow of James B. Thompson, late captain of Company F, One hundred and ninetieth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Captain Thompson entered the service May 15, 1861, as a member of Company G, First Regiment Rifles, Pennsylvania Volunteers, and then became captain of Company I, One hundred and ninetieth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was honorably discharged July 1, 1865, having continuously served from the beginning to the end of the war. He was brevetted major for gallant conduct in the spring of 1865, and was also a recipient of a medal granted by Congress.

He was captured during the war, and was a prisoner at Andersonville and other prisons for nearly seven months.

After his return from the Army, and at the time of his discharge, he was suffering from a severe pain in his breast, the result of a fall while he was in the act of capturing a flag at the battle of Gettysburg, Pa., and also from general debility, the result of exposure while a prisoner of war. He continued to suffer from the date of his discharge, in July, 1865, until the time of his death, August 31, 1875, part of the time having severe hemorrhages.

Captain Thompson failed to apply for a pension in his lifetime, and the applicant, his widow, says she has three children and is in necessitous circumstances.

The committee think that the case is deserving, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill which is herewith reported to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What pension does the bill grant?

Mr. BAYNE. No amount is stated.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is simply under the provisions of the pension laws?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. MARY T. BARNES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary F. Barnes; reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary F. Barnes, widow of Brig. Gen. Joseph K. Barnes, late Surgeon-General United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out "F" and insert "T."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mrs. Mary T. Barnes."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 1406, has had the same under consideration and beg leave to report as follows:

The applicant is the widow of the late Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Joseph K. Barnes, Surgeon-General United States Army, who died in Washington, D. C., April 5, 1883. General Barnes, at the time of his death, had served the Government with distinction from June 5, 1840, having participated in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians, in the war with Mexico, and in the war with the States in rebellion.

The committee beg leave to incorporate in the report the official order of Adjutant-General Drum, by order of General Sherman, and call attention to the official order of the late Surgeon-General Crane. General Barnes died without leaving his family the means of support in their bereaved condition. The increase of pension to Mrs. Mary T. Barnes from $30 to $50 per month is a slight token of what the country owes to the widow of this gallant, distinguished, patriotic officer. The committee therefore report the bill referred to it, and recommend that it do pass.

[General Orders No. 22.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 5, 1883.

The following order has been received from the War Department and is published to the Army:

Bvt. Maj. Gen. Joseph K. Barnes, brigadier-general, United States Army (retired), late Surgeon-General of the Army, died at his residence in this city at 2 o'clock this morning. He entered the service as assistant-surgeon June 15, 1840; was promoted surgeon, with the rank of major, August 29, 1856; medical inspector, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, February 9, 1863; medical inspector-general, with the rank of colonel, August 10, 1863; and Surgeon-General, with the rank of brigadier-general, August 22, 1864. He was retired from active service by operation of law June 30, 1882.

He served with distinction in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians, in the war with Mexico, and in the war with the States in rebellion. For faithful, meritorious, and distinguished services in this last war the brevets of brigadier-general and major-general, United States Army, were conferred upon him.

He was eminent, skillful, and successful in his profession as surgeon and physician, and distinguished for great administrative ability as the head of the Medical Department. Under the fostering care of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, he accomplished the successful establishment of the Medical History of the War and of the medical museum: and he brought the Medical Department to the highest state of efficiency.

During the troublous times of the late war he earned the unbounded confidence of the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, and held it unshaken to the last. At the time of the assassination of President Lincoln and the attempted assassination of Secretary Seward he attended the death-bed of the one and ministered with untiring energy and skill to the successful restoration of the other. So during the long illness of President Garfield he was one of the distinguished surgeons who for days and nights served with devoted duty in the sick chamber of the dying President. During these long protracted hours of anxiety and care his own health gave way, and from that moment to the time of his death he was an invalid.

His career was one of honor to himself and of great service to his country.

By command of General Sherman.

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

He died at Washington, D. C., April 5, 1883, of cirrhosis of the kidneys.

R. C. DRUM,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The Committee on Invalid Pensions propose in this bill to grant a pension of $50 a month to the widow of a general officer who received during a considerable part of his life some $400 a month for his services. We grant $8 a month to the widow of a private soldier who was killed during the war of the rebellion. On the one side of the street we may find living the widow of an officer who received $4,000 or $5,000 a year as compensation for his services receiving $50 a month, and on the other side the widow of a private soldier who lost his life on some battlefield, and she gets $8 a month. Now, that does not seem to me to be right. Whatever others may think about it, it does not seem to me to be right.

I acknowledge the meritorious services of Dr. Barnes. But many a soldier lies sleeping his last sleep on Southern battlefields who, if now living, might be as brilliant, might possess ability as great as that of Surgeon-General Barnes, and their widows receive pensions of only $8 a month. It is true we have passed one or two bills to-night granting pensions as high as $30 a month, the highest rate of pension given by general law. I do not think we should go above $30 a month in this case, any more than in the other cases which have come before us, of the widows of officers who were killed in service. Why should we single out the widow of an officer who received large pay during his whole life and grant her a high rate of pension, while we deny it to others? Whatever else we may do here, that is not just.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know that anything that can be said on this bill will change the action of the Committee of the Whole upon such cases. But I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that while there are thousands, and tens of thousands, and scores of thousands of widows of private soldiers who are receiving pensions of only $8 per month, we should not be overhasty in increasing the pensions of those drawing larger pensions already than they do. On account of the larger salaries officers received they had a better opportunity to lay up money than did the private soldiers.

I have felt that it was right to say this much. Who is proposing to increase the pensions of the widows of private soldiers?

Mr. MATSON. This committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This committee? By general law?

Mr. MATSON. Yes; by a general bill which has been reported.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then let this case wait and take its chance with the others. You propose to act with a hot haste in this case which does not characterize your action in the other cases. Let them all come up together.

You have a special order for to-night and for all Friday nights, for the consideration of pension bills only. I do not complain of that. I am willing to take up the work of this Congress at any time and at all times, let it come from what committee it may. But I do say that there is no excuse for acting with a haste for the increase of the pensions of the wives of officers which does not characterize your action in the case of the wives of private soldiers. This House can not justify itself in any such proceeding. Is it alleged that this lady is a pauper? Is she in indigent circumstances?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, she is.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Even if she is, are we justified in taking her case out of the general class of indigents and putting it in front of that general class? I do not think it is right. The Committee of the Whole can do as it pleases, and then the House succeeding the Committee of the Whole can exercise its pleasure. They all ought to be placed on the ground of merit, and then they can be justified. If it can stand that test I am content.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if he would make no distinction whatever between the widow of a soldier who enlisted and served perhaps a hundred days or twelve months, and the widow of a soldier, of an officer who gave his whole life to the service of his country?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would answer that question in this way: that the pension of classes ought to be fixed by general law. If a greater pension is deserved on account of length of service, then let the amount be fixed by general law, and let that law apply to the widows of generals, of colonels, and of common soldiers who have served for a great length of time. I have no desire to detract from this soldier anything he has by hard service earned, but thought it proper to say this much.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I do not like the distinction any better than does my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] which is often made in these cases by this House. But it does seem to me that the gentleman ought to make a distinction, and this Committee of the Whole ought to make a distinction in cases where a man has given his whole life and died while in the service of his country.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do it by a general law, and let the law apply to all cases of a similar kind.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I do not know that you can do that very well.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman think that the widow of an officer who has been in the regular service all his life and received regular Army pay all the time should receive a greater pension than the widow of an officer who was killed in battle?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. No; I do not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I question whether there ought to be any distinction at all on account of rank. I am not prepared to say that there ought to be any distinction; but certainly there ought not to be a distinction between widows of officers or soldiers in the regular and volunteer service. How is the widow in the one case entitled to more than the other?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I would like to ask my friend from Ohio a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Why make any distinction between the pay of an officer and the pay of a soldier who serves in the ranks?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is a reason for that; there is greater responsibility in the one case than in the other. But I have very grave doubts whether there ought to be the difference in pensions which we are making here or any difference at all. In the case of the widow of a general officer who has received high pay during his whole life, who was not killed in battle, who did not die from any disease contracted in the service, so far as we know, but who died a natural death after long service—to put the widow of such an officer on the pension-roll at a higher rate of pension than the widow of an officer killed in battle is an act of injustice that I can not see done here without at least entering my protest.

Brigadier-generals and major-generals and others in Government service must learn to save from the salaries they receive in the service if they would not leave their families in want.

Mr. ROSECRANS. What was the gentleman's own experience in saving?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Well, the chances for saving were not very good when we were in the field and when we were paid in currency worth 40 or 50 cents on the dollar. But I do not know why an officer drawing four or five thousand dollars a year and serving at a permanent station for years can not save from his salary as well as men in civil life can save from their earnings. Let me tell my friend that the average earnings of the great mass of the people of this country are less, on the average, than $300 a year. Out of the 20,000,000 of our people who labor for their livelihood, 15,000,000 receive less than $300 each per annum; yet these are the people who in the end must pay these pensions.

Mr. VALENTINE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is he a pensioner?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will answer that question by asking another: Does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] draw pay for his services here?

Mr. VALENTINE. I do.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then why do you not vote to put everybody else on the pay-roll at the same rate of compensation?

Mr. VALENTINE. Now will the gentleman answer my question? I have answered his.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Every man who lost a limb or was otherwise disabled in the military service is as much entitled to a pension as the gentleman is to his pay. The pension is compensation for loss of limb or other disability incurred in the service in the line of duty; and the pensioner is as much entitled to this compensation as the President of the United States is to his salary. It is compensation which was promised to the soldier by the laws when he entered the service. But if a man has suffered no disability, then under the law he is not entitled to this compensation.

Pension is not a gratuity nor a charity or ought not to be, but compensation for disability; and it ought to be suggestive of battle struggles, of wounds and scars, of disability incurred in the service of the country. It is, or ought to be, a roll of honor. It is not compensation to a man for mere patriotism, for having thought well of his country. It is everybody's duty to be patriotic, to serve his country in time of need. But only they who in that service become disabled are entitled to pensions. Ten thousand men, if you please, go into battle; nine thousand come out as well as when they went in; one thousand are killed or wounded. Now, they who in the exigencies of battle lose life or limb are entitled—they or their widows and children—to special compensation for this loss which they only have sustained. The whole idea of a pension is compensation to those who have suffered in this way in battle or campaigns. This principle is as old as war itself. Why, sir, it was the custom when war was waged for spoil alone to give to him who was wounded a double share of the booty. Pension as compensation for disability incurred in war is one thing; but to grant a large pension to the widow of a general officer who has drawn large pay all his life is quite a different thing.

Mr. VALENTINE. Now, will you please answer my question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is your question?

Mr. VALENTINE. You have spoken about fifteen minutes, but have not answered my question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is your question? I thought I had sufficiently answered it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I asked whether you draw a pension?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has no right to ask such a question as that here on this floor. It has nothing to do with the case before us.

Mr. VALENTINE. If you decline to answer, I do not press it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I answered the question, I thought, by asking whether you drew pay as a member of Congress, and if so, why you did not vote to put everybody else in the country on the pay-roll as a member of Congress. I am sure—and if my friend will not agree with me perhaps others will—that there are a great many quite as able as he to perform duty here.

Mr. VALENTINE. Now as the gentleman has declined to answer, I desire to ask him a question predicated on another question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will answer the question directly. I was placed on the pension-roll immediately after the war.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is all right.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, I will not stop there now. I propose to go further. I have never referred on this floor to my own military record; but as this question has been raised a number of times, I will state that on resigning the commission I held from the President of the United States at the close of the war, with wounds still unhealed, I was placed on the pension-rolls from the record—without other evidence than the record shows; and I will say to the gentleman that if he can point to another soldier who suffered more than I suffered from wounds on the battlefield and from the knife of the surgeon and who is drawing less pension I will gladly give up mine, although I count it as much my due as the pay I now receive.

Mr. BAYNE. You deserved it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I raised no question as to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But there have been reflections on this floor on this account.

Mr. VALENTINE. Not from me.

Mr. RANDALL. You meant it as such.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I lay for more than six hours under the surgeon's knife, after it was made known to me that there was no possibility of recovery unless by such an operation as the records will show was performed and the ball which remained in my body was extracted; and for six long hours in this city I lay under the influence of chloroform undergoing the operations, during which time it became necessary to send to the office of the Surgeon-General whose case we are considering, and I may even be indebted to him, but that does not change my duty here. I think I have now answered the gentleman's questions.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman from Nebraska has left the field.

Mr. VALENTINE. For fear there may be some misunderstanding I wish to say——

Mr. SLOCUM. We are not considering the case of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]. I hope we shall come back to the pending bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I regret that my case has been brought in here, and I did not allude to it till I was compelled to.

Mr. RANDALL. You are justified in all you have said.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think I am justified under the circumstances in what I have said. I do not ask gentlemen, however, to take what I have said, but ask you to go to the records of the War Department and the Surgeon-General's records.

Mr. VALENTINE. I am raising no question about the justice of your pension. I believe you were a brave officer and deserved all you received. But I wished to make the point in answer to what you said, that by reason of the fact you were an officer you had been granted a higher pension than you would if you had been a private soldier.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My pension is not as large as that of private soldiers generally with the same disability. But I have said before that I have grave doubts whether there ought to be any distinction when you come to pension between an officer and a private soldier.

Several MEMBERS. Vote!

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, discussion as to the pension of others has nothing to do with this case. And I hope it will not be taken for or against pensioning the widow of General Barnes.

In reply to what was said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] in relation to increasing the pensions of the widows of private soldiers, I wish to say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions suspended action on this very case of the widow of General Barnes until they had first disposed of the bill providing for increase of the pension of every widow of a private soldier from $8 to $12 a month. They refused to act on it, although the friends of Mrs. Barnes were pressing day by day to pass the bill for her relief. We declined until we had acted on the general bill for the benefit of the widows of the private soldiers. I say that much in justification of the action of the committee on this bill. [Applause.]

In relation to the criticism made as to placing the widow of General Barnes on the pension-roll and making her an exception, that is hardly true, because the widows of those who have served as long as General Barnes have in nearly every instance had their pensions increased from $30 to $50 a month. So that this is not an exceptional case. It is only following out in the line of well-established precedent in every case brought to the attention of Congress since I have been a member of this House.

I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not usually take part in the debates on pension bills, but I feel I would do injustice to myself if I did not say a word on this pending measure. I do not believe any man ever occupied a position in the line or staff of the Army of the United States who rendered more invaluable service to the country and gave it more distinction than the late Surgeon-General Barnes. I know the fact that, whatever gentlemen may say about the large pay he received on the staff or in the line of the Army, he had to reside in the city of Washington, where all a man's pay is absorbed in the expense of living. He left a family that needs this which the widow demands, and I appeal to you, I, a Southern man, I, an ex-rebel, I appeal to the House on both sides, North and South, whether they are not willing to give the widow of a man who for over forty years faithfully served his country, who did duty on the frontier, went to the city of Mexico with Scott's victorious legions, followed old Zach. Taylor almost to the battle of Buena Vista and would have gone there if he had not been ordered down on Scott's line, went through all the dangers of the Seminole war, and served in the Army during the civil war until he was advanced to the position of Surgeon-General; who stood by the bedside of the dying Lincoln and rendered invaluable service to the dying Garfield, and never received any compensation for either—I ask if it is not a small matter when the widow comes here and asks the country he served so well to give her $50 a month? [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I shall ask for a quorum on this bill.

Mr. MATSON. If we are allowed to take the bill into the House I will see to it that it is not voted on unless a quorum is present.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is all I ask; that a quorum shall be present when it is disposed of.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CRISP moved that the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 47.

So the committee refused to rise.

MRS. ELLEN M. FLAGG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3238) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Flagg.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ellen M. Flagg, widow of the late William H. Flagg, late a member of the Fifty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

Ellen M. Flagg is the widow of William H. Flagg, Company G, Fifty-seventh Massachusetts Infantry. He enlisted February 27, 1864, and was honorably discharged May 31, 1865, for wounds received in service. He was granted an invalid pension (certificate No. 49183). His wounds were received at the battle of the Wilderness, a ball shattering both bones of left forearm, rendering it always after useless; and he also had two ribs fractured and the lung perforated, the ball passing around to his side, near the spine, where it was afterward found and extracted. In the same battle a ball passed through his cap and over the cranium, producing a concussion, from the effect of which he ever afterward suffered, causing him severe pains in the head and to become unconscious for hours. Recovering from these attacks, he would be prostrated and weak. He finally died in the infirmary at Cleveland, Ohio, January 1, 1880, whither he was taken from his room at a hotel where he was stopping in an unconsious condition, and remaining so until his death. His widow filed an application for pension June 26, 1880, which was rejected on the ground of lack of sufficient medical evidence that the soldier's death was the result of wounds contracted while in service.

The evidence in the case is as follows, namely:

Sarah Eliza Randall certifies that—

"Flagg was in good health before enlistment, &c.; complained of great pain in head at times after service, suffering extreme agony, ofttimes becoming unconscious; never had these attacks before the war."

James E. Robbins certifies:

"Lived in same house with Flagg two years; saw him every day; was in poor health; he would often fall from his chair, and while at work, suffering from the pains in his head, would be unconscious for hours, and after such attacks be prostrate for days."

Dr. Horatio W. Clapp testifies:

"No brain trouble before enlistment; always healthy," &c.

Martha P. Clapp corroborates the above.

Alexander Flagg certifies:

"Soldier was in good health at enlistment. After discharge had frequent attacks of acute brain disease and paroxysms of pain; never had brain trouble before enlistment."

B. W. Holliday, M. D., and Thomas Rome, steward at the Cleveland City Infirmary, certify that—

"Flagg was admitted to the institution December 30, 1879, in an insensible condition, and remained so until he died, two days later; that, as no post mortem examination was made, the real cause of death was unknown, as well as a history of the illness, to any one here."

There is no evidence showing treatment for this disease in civil life; but the indications are that, as the trouble was permanent and by him considered incurable, he endured it as best he could until death relieved him.

We think the evidence of neighbors and acquaintances as to the extent and frequency of his paroxysms of pain and insensibility, supported as it is by the manner of his death, as certified by Dr. Holliday and Steward Rome, show a condition which, had a post mortem been had, would have demonstrated that the cause of death was nearly connected with, and had its origin in, the injury to brain at the time the bullet passed through his cap, cutting into his hair, &c.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. CRISP. I ask for a division on laying aside that bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 2.

Mr. CRISP. No quorum.

Mr. MATSON. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to state his objection to the bill now, so that we can go on with the Calendar.

Mr. CRISP. My objection to proceeding is that I think it is time to adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. I hope that will not be done until we have passed the bills in the House. It will not take fifteen minutes. I propose that we shall adjourn by 10 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CRISP. I do, sir.

Mr. MATSON. It is evident that there is no quorum present, and if the gentleman insists upon the point it is not worth while to attempt to go on in the committee. Tellers will not develop a quorum, for it is plain that a quorum is not present.

Mr. BAYNE. We will get a quorum.

Mr. GOFF. Yes, if it takes all night.

Mr. MATSON. Let us pass these bills to-night. I move that the committee do now arise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the pension bills on the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bills without amendments first.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendments, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed, read the third time, and passed, namely:

SARAH BRYAN LEET.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2608) granting a pension to Sarah Bryan Leet, with an amendment.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to call the attention of the House to this case, for the reason that when the report was being read, if I understood it correctly, it stated that this soldier was a major, and had held some position upon the staff; and, further, that the recommendation of the committee, if I am not in error, was that his pension should be that of a private soldier. If I am correct in that I would like to know the reason why the pension is fixed at such a low rate.

Mr. MATSON. I think the gentleman is correct. Major Leet was on General Grant's staff. The bill provides that his widow shall be pensioned as the widow of a private of a battery, because the disease for which pension was granted was incurred while serving as a private soldier.

Mr. HOPKINS addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 591) granting a pension to W. H. Blake;

A bill (H. R. 314) for the relief of John W. Cummins;

A bill (H. R. 3606) granting a pension to Irene Baker;

A bill (H. R. 4036) to increase the pension of Thomas Ward; and

A bill (H. R. 554) granting a pension to Joseph T. Caldwell.

MRS. MARY F. BARNES.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary F. Barnes, with an amendment.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am informed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] that the gentleman from Ohio [General WARNER] has withdrawn all objection to this case and consents that a vote be taken upon it now. It will be remembered that it was understood it was to be passed over until a quorum was present.

Mr. TUCKER. I had an interview with the gentleman from Ohio, and he stated that he withdrew all objection to a vote upon the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the votes by which the several pension bills were passed, except the bill (H. R. 2608) granting a pension to Sarah Bryan Leet; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. SARAH BRYAN LEET.

Mr. HOPKINS. I tried to get recognition from the Speaker, but bills were being rushed through on their passage so rapidly that I was not heard in regard to the bill (H. R. 2608) granting a pension to Sarah Bryan Leet. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which that bill was passed with the view of moving an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair had understood that the gentleman's object in rising was to obtain recognition for that purpose it would have been accorded to him then. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill indicated was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to amend by striking out "$8 a month" and inserting "$25 a month," for the reasons suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE]. Mr. Leet contracted the disease of which he died as a private, and the committee for that reason allowed only the pension granted to a private soldier.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the words "$8 per month" are not in the bill. The Clerk will report the bill as it passed the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet, widow of George K. Leet, late a private in Cooley's Independent Battery.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I move to amend by adding the words "at the rate of $25 per month."

I was about to state that this officer contracted the disease while serving as a private, that he continued to serve during the war, and that he was adjutant-general on General Grant's staff, and that while he continued to serve in that capacity he aggravated the disease from which he died. I think it right the widow with five little children left helpless should have a pension in accordance with the rank her husband held most of the time of his service and which he held when he died.

Mr. MATSON. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] fixing the rate at which this lady would be pensioned would confine her to that rate and would give no pension at all to the children. Under the bill as reported by the committee the widow would draw a pension of $8 per month, and each child, five in number, would draw $2 per month, making $18 in all. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to give $25 per month. That fixes the pension for the widow at $25, and it would stop there. If that amendment is made the case does not go on the pension-roll subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, but the rate is fixed by law. When the bill fixes the rate of pension the general law ceases to operate. The special law itself controls the sum to be paid as a pension. So that the amendment would increase the pension to this family $7 a month.

Now, our committee considered the case very thoroughly, and while I have no disposition to make any captious opposition to the amendment, I will say we thought under the circumstances it was right to pension this widow at the rate at which her husband would have been pensioned if he had been the pensioner; because the proof was very clear that the disease was incurred while he was a private, not while he was a major, and our committee so decided, I think, without any objection on the part of any member of the committee.

We leave the matter, however, to the House. It is not a matter about which we are disposed to be captious at all. We wish the House to decide as in its judgment it sees fit, remembering, however, that there are a large class of persons who are now pensioned as private soldiers because of wounds or diseases contracted while they were private soldiers who afterward became officers, and that the rule has not heretofore been violated so far as we are informed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Inasmuch as the services in this case as a private soldier were rendered during a comparatively small portion of Major Leet's military service, the great bulk of them and the more distinguished services being rendered in higher rank, I appeal to the gentlemen to grant this additional pension. Although it is a small sum, it will be considerable to this family.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has stated a very good principle that we are not adhering to precedents or to rules that have been heretofore established. We are passing upon each specific case upon its especial merits, and it appears to me that this case has the merits.

Mr. CULLEN. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, the question of precedents having been referred to, that to adopt this amendment would introduce a precedent that would be exceedingly dangerous. There are thousands of cases perhaps on the pension-rolls to-day of this class—men who received disabilities while private soldiers, afterward for meritorious conduct were promoted from one grade to another until many of them received a high rank. These are receiving from the Pension Office, under the law, only the pensions that private soldiers are entitled to, and the question with us is whether or not in making this an exception we would not be doing manifest injustice to this very large class of men who are receiving pensions in the regular order under the law, and whether it would not bring before this House and the Congress of the United States many cases, in the aggregate perhaps thousands of cases from year to year, in which an increase would be demanded on equally good grounds with those on which this is claimed.

I think, sir, that the committee in this case exercised a sound discretion. There is but little difference in the amounts that would be received by this family for the present at least; and for one I should feel a great deal of hesitancy in making this a marked exception.

Mr. GOFF. I do not desire to oppose what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] seeks to accomplish by his motion. I only want to suggest to him whether or not by his amendment he may not do an injustice to the children of this dead soldier. As I understand the law at the present time, in case this widow should die to-morrow——

Mr. MATSON. Or remarry.

Mr. GOFF. Or remarry, the pension proposed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions would continue to the children. But should the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] be adopted, in case of the death of the widow the pension would stop altogether, and the children would get nothing. I suggest to the gentleman whether his amendment is really in the interest of the children.

Mr. BAGLEY. I wish to say that this morning there came before the Committee on Invalid Pensions a gentleman suffering evidently from great disability. He incurred that disability while a private, but was afterwards promoted to a lieutenant. His pension was the pension of a private, and he came before us asking that a special act be passed increasing his pension; a case precisely like this. The committee refused absolutely to do anything of the kind. I think if we change the rule which has heretofore been operating and amend this bill as proposed by the gentleman from Pensylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] we will be overrun by cases of this character. I think the action of the committee was exactly right.

Mr. STRUBLE. Inasmuch as I propounded an inquiry in reference to this case, I desire to say that after the explanation which has been made by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] I doubt very much if it is wise to make the proposed change in the rule which has heretofore been operating in such cases and to establish a new precedent like this. For one, I do not think it is wise to do so.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am of course not familiar with what the precedents have been, but in view of the statements which have been made as to the effect upon the minor children I will withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment having been withdrawn, the question recurs upon the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 8, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEES AND EARNINGS OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement from the records of his Department showing the past fees and earnings per annum of each United States marshal from 1873 to 1883, in compliance with a resolution passed by the House of Representatives January 16, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SLOCUM, for two days.

To Mr. CHACE, until Monday next.

To Mr. BEACH, until Thursday next, on account of a death in his family.

TELEGRAPH LINES OF SUBSIDIZED RAILROADS.

Mr. CASSIDY. Through an inadvertence a few days ago a communication from the Secretary of the Interior concerning telegraph lines belonging to the subsidized railroads, in response to a call for information by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. I ask unanimous consent that the reference be changed.

There was no objection, and the communication was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

COPYRIGHT OF NEWS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short memorial in relation to a proposed bill providing for a copyright of the news of the day, and that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist respectfully represents that he is in receipt of the following communication, the contents of which he has every reason to believe to be true, namely:

SAINT LOUIS, January 26, 1884.

DEAR SIR: We understand from undoubted authority that a committee representing the metropolitan press is now in Washington engaged in lobbying to secure the passage of a law by Congress to copyright news matter for forty-eight hours after publication. The intention evidently is to legalize a gigantic monopoly of news, and to make it unlawful for the minor newspapers and country press to reproduce current news during the period when it has much value. You will readily see that the projected law would injure and almost destroy the weaker newspapers of the country, and put them at the mercy of the great overgrown newspapers of the large cities. This is a matter in which you and we and the general public have a deep interest. Under the circumstances we feel free to urge you to write immediately to your member of Congress and to any friends you may have either in the House or Senate, acquainting them with the scope of the proposed legislation, and urging them to oppose it.

Your prompt action in this matter may determine the fate of the bill.

Yours, fraternally,

A. N. KELLOGG NEWSPAPER COMPANY.

Your petitioner states that, so far as he is informed, this is perhaps the first effort that was ever made in this or any other civilized country to secure a monopoly of the current news of the day and to place an embargo upon its free transmission and dissemination through the columns of the newspaper press of the country. This foolish measure would, for instance, prevent an afternoon paper in Louisville from republishing anything from the Cincinnati or Indianapolis papers of the same morning. It would prevent the transmission by telegraph of any special matter which may appear in any paper. It would be absolutely fatal to the country newspapers; and the member of Congress who votes for it will drive a nail in his political coffin which will never pull out.

It is not likely the Associated Press could hire any respectable journalist to advocate so foolish and unpopular a measure.

Wherefore your petitioner prays that said measure be not passed.

FRANK M. DAULTON,
Editor and Publisher Green County Events, Arkansas.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some resolutions adopted by the senate of New Jersey, and which were passed by the votes of members of both political parties.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Senate February 25, 1884.

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the object of which is a general reduction of tariff duties as now levied; and

Whereas the passage of said bill would materially affect, if not absolutely destroy, the great industries of this State, particularly those of iron, silk, woolen, glass, and the potteries; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the duties now levied upon articles produced and manufactured in the State are not more than sufficient for the protection of those engaged in the work of producing and manufacturing the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That as any further reduction in the tariff will bring the duties below the point needed for protection and militate against labor by compelling our manufacturers and producers to compete in their own markets with the products of cheap labor of foreign countries, we earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their efforts and votes to defeat the Morrison bill or any other measure which may come before them having for its object the reduction of the duties upon articles manufactured or produced in this State; and

Resolved, That we affirm our belief in the principle of protection as applied to all American industries, including raw materials which are the products of American labor as well as manufactured articles; and that we look with fear and apprehension upon the doctrine of——

Mr. TOWNSHEND [interrupting the reading]. If that memorial is much longer I shall be compelled to object to its further reading.

Mr. PHELPS. There are but a few lines more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS]?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.

Mr. PHELPS. I would like to remark that these resolutions were passed by Democratic votes——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to present a privileged report. The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred a resolution authorizing the employment of a clerk by the Committee on Education, have directed me to report back the same and to recommend the adoption of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. AIKEN, "That the Committee on Education be, and are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk," respectfully report:

That the amount and importance of the business assigned to the consideration of the Committee on Education, under the rules of the House, seem to justify the allowance of a clerk to said committee during the session of the present Congress.

They therefore recommend the passage of the following substitute, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education be allowed a clerk during the sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate now paid House committee clerks who are employed during the sessions only.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute reported by the Committee on Accounts.

The substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question in now upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. COSGROVE. I ask that the report of the committee be again read.

The Clerk again read the report.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask whether the Committee on Education has not already a clerk in conjunction with some other committee?

Mr. SPOONER. One of the thirty-two clerks provided for in the resolution recommended by the Committee on Accounts was assigned to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. RANDALL. If this additional clerk is necessary, I am in favor of the proposition; but I wish information on the subject.

Mr. SPOONER. The clerk assigned to the Committee on the Library was also authorized to act for the Committee on Education. But the Committee on Accounts, to whom the resolution now under consideration was referred, have heard the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN], the chairman of the Committee on Education, and are satisfied——

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Will the gentleman tell us how many bills are before the Committee on Education?

Mr. SPOONER. In a few moments I shall be glad to give to the gentleman from South Carolina an opportunity to make that statement, which he can do much better and more fully than I should be able to do. The Committee on Accounts were quite satisfied that the importance of the Committee on Education and the amount of its business justify the employment of this clerk, and we have accordingly made this recommendation. I now give way to the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Education.

Mr. AIKEN. I was instructed by the Committee on Education to ask for additional clerical help. We have had assigned to our committee a clerk who is also clerk for another committee. As to how many bills have been referred to our committee, I am just now unable to state the number; but I will merely say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] that if he will consult our docket he will find the record of the bills committed to us fills twenty-five or thirty pages.

This House has imposed upon us duties which no member of the committee will consent to perform, and which I, as chairman of the committee, declare I can not perform without additional clerical help. Why, sir, I would like to go through the history of this assignment of committee clerks, if I had an opportunity. [Cries of "Go on!"] I do not wish to monopolize the time of the House, but will simply say that if clerical help be not given to us, our work can not be performed. Our committee is not like the Committee on the Militia, that has not yet had a meeting, but has had its clerk sitting idle for three months. We have met sometimes twice a week, and have met once or twice without a clerk. I repeat that the House has assigned to us duties which no member of the committee will perform without additional clerical help. The Committee on the Library, the secondary services of whose clerk we have been using, have told us that they need the time of their clerk. I repeat that if the work of this House is to go on so far as our committee is concerned, we must have additional help.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to make two brief statements. In the first place, the clerk of the Committee on the Library, who has been assigned also to the Committee on Education, has had additional duties thrown upon him because of the increased jurisdiction of the Committee on the Library, so that he has now no time to give to the Committee on Education.

In the second place, this House, by a resolution passed six or seven days ago, has imposed upon the Committee on Education the duty of investigating the condition of all the agricultural colleges of the country, and this duty alone would be more than sufficient to require the continual services of a clerk.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 124, noes 14.

So the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was disagreed to—two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

NORTH CAROLINA CONTESTED-ELECTION—POOL VS. SKINNER.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, to which was referred resolution of the House adopted on the 19th day of December last, as follows:

Resolved, That Thomas G. Skinner be sworn in, and that it be referred to the Committee on Elections, when appointed, to report at the earliest practicable moment whether the said Thomas G. Skinner was elected from the first Congressional district of North Carolina as created before the last Congressional apportionment of Representatives in Congress, or from a district in North Carolina created in that State since the election of Walter R. Pool, deceased; and to further report whether in the judgment of said committee said Skinner was elected from the proper district—

Submitted a report, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thomas G. Skinner retain his seat without prejudice to the ultimate right to the seat involved in the contested-election case of Charles C. Pool vs. Thomas G. Skinner—

Which was ordered to be printed, and laid over for the present.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I wish to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that at an early day next week I will call up the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections for the decision of the House.

Mr. RANNEY. I ask by unanimous consent to be permitted to present the views of the minority hereafter, as they are not now quite ready, and that an order be entered that they be printed with the majority report.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

R. 3656) granting a pension to Mrs. Orrin Walker; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELLEN CALL LONG AND MRS. MARY K. BREVARD.

Mr. OCHILTREE, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 4403) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen Call Long and Mrs. Mary K. Brevard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the petition of R. H. Hoffman for relief; which was ordered to be laid on the table and the accompanying report printed.

Mr. TULLY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 5036) for the relief of Margaret T. Dugan; which was ordered to be laid on the table and the accompanying report printed.

Mr. EVERHART, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 2846) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Webb, deceased; which was ordered to be laid on the table and the accompanying report printed.

Mr. EVERHART, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 3787) for the relief of Mrs. E. G. C. Abbott; which was ordered to be laid on the table and the accompanying report printed.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY.

Mr. GUENTHER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. 4089) to empower the commissioners of the District of Columbia to examine the claim, and providing for the payment of Outerbridge Horsey, assignee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONVICT LABOR.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, reported, as a substitute for House bill 5373, a bill (H. R. 5694) to prescribe the regular hours of labor imposed upon and required of persons heretofore convicted, or who may hereafter be convicted, in the courts of the United States and imprisoned under sentence of said courts at labor or with hard labor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 4481) to amend section 3013 of the Revised Statutes; which was ordered to be laid on the table and the accompanying report printed.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. MUTCHLER, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back the bill (H. R. 4460) to repeal sections of the Revised Statutes restricting the term of certain offices to four years, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 646) to reform the civil service; which was ordered to be laid on the table and the accompanying report printed.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Mr. SLOCUM. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to present at this time the views of the minority of the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests on the bill with reference to the purchase of foreign-built ships, with a substitute for said bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the minority cannot report a substitute for the bill. It may be offered as a substitute for the bill in the House when the bill is up for consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. The minority of the committee had leave to report in this case.

The SPEAKER. The House gave leave to the minority to present its views, but not to report a bill as a bill; that is, one which will go upon the Calendar.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think there will be no objection in the present case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to ascertain the number of the bill upon which the minority desire to submit their views.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have the report of the committee upon that bill in my hands.

The SPEAKER. Then the report of the committee should be first presented; afterwards the views of the minority.

Mr. DINGLEY, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 3230) amendatory of title 48 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States in the foreign carrying trade; which, on his motion, with the adverse recommendation, was placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SLOCUM, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, submitted the views of the minority on said bill; which were ordered to be printed, and placed on the Calendar with the report of the committee.

PENSIONS, BOUNTY, AND BACK PAY.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, from the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, submitted the report of certain testimony, documents, interviews, and other papers relating to the said subject; which were ordered to be printed and recommitted to the committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of standing and select committees for reports.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. MORRISON addressed the Chair.

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer a resolution of inquiry for present consideration, and ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to yield to me for that purpose. The resolution relate to a matter of importance.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

LANDS PURCHASED FROM SEMINOLE INDIANS.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to immediately inform this House if any portion of the lands purchased from the Seminole Indians under treaty of March 21, 1866, have been surveyed and divided into townships, ranges, sections, and quarter-sections; and, if so, to state what portion of said lands have been surveyed, under what law, and for what purpose the survey was made.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion can not be made that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the post-office appropriation bill. It may be made that the House shall resolve itself into committee for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue. Pending that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I will ask the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], as debate not being in order I can not indulge in it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks under the rule the vote must be first taken on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. HISCOCK. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] announce the purpose for which he moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. MORRISON. I did; for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

A MEMBER. The bonded whisky bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it be in order to move to proceed to the consideration of bills on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. That motion can be pending, but the others must be put first.

Mr. COX, of New York. Which would take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The two motions which have already been made take precedence.

Mr. COX, of New York. I make the motion that the House proceed to the consideration of bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. KEIFER. On which motion does the Chair state that the vote shall be taken first?

The SPEAKER. On the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], who moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point that it is not in order to state in the motion the purpose for which the House is asked to go into committee. It is simply in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Then the rule fixes what bills shall have preference.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the more intelligent mode to state the purpose of the motion.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair thinks it is expressly authorized by the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. It is certainly a more intelligent mode, and it enables members to vote intelligently when the bill is named.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Clerk to read clause 9 of Rule XVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The rule states, for the purpose of considering, not any particular bill, but bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. There will be a question raised as to the order of precedence if the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue. Now, where would that question of order arise; in the Committee of the Whole or in the House?

The SPEAKER. In Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. The vote in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] would require us to consider revenue bills when we got into Committee of the Whole, would it not?

The SPEAKER. It would require the Committee of the Whole to consider bills raising revenue if there are any such on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole. The motion does not decide whether there are or not.

Mr. MORRISON. There is one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of New York. I should like the Chair to state the order of these three motions.

Mr. RANDALL. The House knows it very well and debate is not in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order that this is not debatable.

Mr. COX, of New York. Other gentlemen have made their statements. It is due from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to state what is his object, and also the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to state what is his object.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. My inquiry is whether it would be in order at this time for the gentlemen to state the purposes of their motions to enable us to vote intelligently. I for one can not vote intelligently with the information I have.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentlemen respectively have made the motions in the only form in which they are allowed by the rule to be made, and debate is not in order.

Mr. MORRISON. On which motion are we about to vote?

The SPEAKER. On the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] who has just addressed the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. That the House shall go into committee to consider a revenue bill; that is it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 127, not voting 78; as follows:

Pair me on whisky bill. I vote against it and its consideration.

He is on the same side with me. I have secured a pair for Mr. O'NEILL with Mr. JOHN S. WISE, of Virginia.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. When I consented yesterday to pair with my colleague [Mr. LAMB] it was distinctly understood that it should be stated that on all questions concerning the bonded whisky bill I would vote "no" and he would vote "ay." I notice that in announcing the pairs that statement was omitted, and I think in justice to both him and myself it should go upon the record.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 87) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot;

A bill (S. 206) making an appropriation for the purchase of ground and the erection thereon in the city of Washington of a building to be used as a hall of records; and

A bill (S. 309) to amend section 673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the quorum of the Supreme Court of the United States, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will withdraw my motion to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND was agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I desire to give notice that when the Post-Office appropriation bill shall have been concluded I will call up the agricultural appropriation bill.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The first bill of that character is the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before we enter upon the discussion of this bill I would like to ascertain how much time may be desired for general debate, so that we may know when we shall be able to enter upon the consideration of the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HORR. I will say to my colleague on the committee [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that I think it utterly impossible to state now how much time will be required for the general debate. I think that after the debate has run on a while we can come to some understanding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does my friend from Michigan think that more than two hours and a half will be required on each side?

Mr. HORR. Oh, yes; more than that, I think. I should say about four hours on each side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, I hope my friend will discover it will not be necessary to occupy four hours on each side in the general discussion of this bill.

Mr. HORR. I think we had better not undertake to fix any limitation now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will not now attempt to fix a limitation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest that we postpone anything of that kind until the bill comes up the next time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have been instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to present for the consideration of this House the general appropriation bill making provisions for the support of the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. While we have kept steadily in view the fact that the postal more than any other branch of the public service is constantly growing with our population, development, and business, and have conscientiously sought to make provision sufficiently liberal to promote its efficiency and avoid danger of crippling the public service, we have at the same time been mindful of our duty to the tax-payer, believing as we do that economy in expenditures is necessary in order to lead the way to the reduction of taxation. The gravest duty resting upon this Congress is the reduction of taxation. In order to accomplish that beneficent result we must see that wise economy is enforced.

It has been said of Mr. Fawcett, the distinguished postmaster-general of England, that he wishes to make the world a part of the post-office department. When we consider a comparison of the postal statistics of our own and foreign countries it would seem that we are more vulnerable to such a charge than England. The mother country, however, has been the leader in postal reforms, in the invention of facilities, and in cheapening postal charges. The laudation which the English system has received from a recent writer is not perhaps extravagant. In speaking of its organization he said:

Carlyle was never tired of exulting in the marvelous efficiency produced by military drill. The post-office exemplifies a skill of a higher kind than that of soldiers, and may boast an army moving with a precision as exact as that of any destructive force, and working always not for any merely negative result, but to further the better acquaintance of man with man, to facilitate the interchange of ideas and commodities, and consequently to increase good-will and mutual helpfulness.

Its uses are more varied in England than in this country. But the conveyance of correspondence is no longer here as it is there the sole duty which the post-office undertakes. We can pay our debts through the post and transmit merchandise. Our rates of postage are almost as cheap and our facilities for conveyance as efficient as in any country. A letter may be sent for 5 cents or a circular for 2 cents to the north of China from here, traveling across the continent and the Pacific Ocean, or, at the will of the sender, over the Atlantic, across Europe, through the dreary flats of Russia and the immense wastes of Siberia.

In England, however, the postal department carries on an enormous banking business, of which one person in every ten in England and Wales is a customer, and it holds deposits to the extent of £39,000,000 or $185,000,000. Not content with the speed of steam, England has employed electricity to convey its correspondence faster than the wind—as quick as thought—throughout the kingdom.

Our own system is, however, marvelous in its proportions and its efficiency. In many respects it has outstripped that of any country in the world. Official data show that we have the largest number of post-offices and the longest mileage, railway and otherwise. We receive the largest revenue, we carry more postal cards and newspapers, and with the exception of England we carry more letters than any other nation.

But, sir, it must be confessed that the cost of our service greatly exceeds that of any other country, and at times perhaps greater abuses have crept into it than in any other land. It has become the most extensive branch of the Federal administration. It engages a larger number of employés than any other branch of the public service, and more money is expended in its operations than in any other public service. This bill will carry an appropriation nearly double that of any of the great money bills except the pension. Our postal expenditures have grown wonderfully in the last few years, far more rapidly than those of any other nation. But this is doubtless due to the fact that the population, trade, and intelligence of our land have also outgrown that of any other, and because we have a more widely extended area of population to supply.

Mr. Chairman, the estimate submitted by the Postmaster-General of the probable revenue for the incoming year was made before any certain data was ascertained of the receipts during the first two quarters of the current year. It was based partly upon the supposition that there would be a considerable falling off of receipts by reason of the reduction of postage during the last Congress from 3 to 2 cents, and the statistics of the receipts for the last fiscal year were relied upon as a guide, and the sum was fixed at $47,104,078.31. But the receipts of the first two quarters of the current year have now been sufficiently ascertained to show that this estimate is too small.

It is now believed by many who are well informed upon the subject that our postal revenue will not fall much, if any, below $50,000,000, for the receipts have been surprisingly greater than was anticipated. The estimates of the Department call for an appropriation of $50,062,189.60. This bill provides for an appropriation of $45,261,900. The appropriations for the current year ending June 30, 1884, made at the last session, amounted to $44,487,520. The appropriations made by the last Congress reduced the appropriations of the previous year $695,380, whereas this bill increases the appropriations above that of last session $774,380, and above the appropriation of the previous year $1,469,760. The bill of last year reduced six items below the appropriations of the year before.

The appropriations proposed in this bill reduce only three items below the appropriations made last year. One is a reduction of $20,000 for advertising, which was recommended by the Department. We omit all appropriation for special mail facilities on railroads, or rapid transit, because this was not estimated for by the Department, and in the judgment of the committee it was not thought proper to bring in an appropriation for this purpose; especially so because it was not recommended by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. How much was that item?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars was appropriated for this purpose last year. Perhaps it will all be expended; I do not know as to that; I think the contracts will perhaps cover it. As I have said, no renewal of this appropriation has been asked for by the Department and none is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

There is but one other reduction that we have made; that is $10,000 for miscellaneous expenditures in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. Ninety thousand dollars was appropriated for this purpose in 1883, but only $70,992.79 were expended. We have given about $9,000 increase, which no doubt will be sufficient.

As I have already remarked, we have reduced but three items below the appropriations of last year, while on the other hand we have increased the appropriations on twenty-one items over and above those of last year. The committee has investigated as far as was in their power all the items contained in this bill, and reported what they believed to be necessary for the public service.

In the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Department we left every estimate untouched in any particular whatever, because his estimates are moderate and no doubt justified by the increased business resulting from change in rate of postage. A very large number of the items provided for in this bill are fully up to the estimates. We also left untouched the foreign mail service, giving all that was asked.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to consume much time at this stage of the debate. It is not my intention to do more than to put before the House a bare statement of the principal features of the bill. I have given the figures showing the aggregate estimates and appropriations of last year, and the amount of the appropriations recommended by the Committee on Appropriations in the pending bill.

There are but three provisions in the bill for new legislation. One provides for the reduction of the rate for transportation on ordinary railroads 5 per cent. and on land-grant railroads 50 per cent. Another is in regard to the salaries of postmasters. The bill provides that the salary of no postmaster shall exceed $4,000 a year. The only other new legislation in the bill is one section abolishing the use of official stamps. It provides for the use hereafter of what is called the penalty envelope by all the Departments and bureaus. It is understood, perhaps, by the House there are some of the Departments which use a large number of official stamps in addition to the penalty envelopes. They send official stamps to correspondents so they may be employed in the payment of return postage.

The Committee on Appropriations believe not only uniformity but economy will be promoted by abolishing the further use of official stamps by any of the Departments and the use in their place of penalty envelopes.

The chairman will be kind enough to tell me how much of my time is remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before I go further I wish to draw the attention of the House to the item making appropriation for the salaries of postmasters. The new legislation provided for in this bill limiting the salaries of postmasters to $4,000 a year will only apply to nine offices—San Francisco, Washington, Chicago, Baltimore, Boston, Saint Louis, New York, Cincinnati, and Philadelphia; but the rapid increase of postal revenue would soon raise other cities upon the same footing. The first item over which there will be any considerable contest or discussion in the consideration of this bill is probably the one providing for the salaries of postmasters in the United States. Congress appropriated $8,800,000 to pay the salaries of postmasters for the year 1883, but the expenditures for that year amounted to $10,315,394.46.

The appropriation for 1884 was $9,250,000, which was $1,065,394.46 below the actual expenses of the previous year. The reduction made by the last session below the estimates was $894,000. The estimate of the Department last year below the expenditure of the previous year was $181.383. It is very strange that the Department last year called for $181,000 less than the actual expenditures of the previous year. That is a startling fact in view also of the further fact that our postal system was then, as now, constantly increasing in the number of postmasters and business. Why did the Department call for $12,250,000 this year on this item and only call for $10,136,000 last year, or $2,114,000 less than this year?

Mr. LONG. What is the reason?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks me what is the reason for this. I am at a loss to fully understand why the Post-Office Department made an estimate last year of $181,000 below the expenditures of the previous year unless for a reason which I will give before I close debate on this bill and after I have had an opportunity to hear from the other side. A large deficiency has been accruing in the last two or three years in the payment of salaries of postmasters because of meager and insufficient appropriations.

The Committee on Appropriations in this Congress, desiring to provide every dollar that might be needed for the postal service, has increased the appropriation largely beyond what was given last year. We have appropriated for compensation to postmasters $1,250,000 in excess of the appropriation of the last session. A much larger sum was estimated for, but if you will examine the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General you will find the only sum positively stated to be necessary as definitely ascertained for the purpose of paying postmasters' salaries will amount to $10,641,358. I do not concede the accuracy of this estimate, for I believe it is too much. We have in this bill given the Department $10,500,000. The remainder estimated by the Department to make up the enormous sum of $12,250,000 is based upon mere conjecture of percentages of increase. We have given about what it is definitely ascertained will be required to pay salaries. For when you take into consideration the fact that the salaries next year will be based upon two instead of three cent stamps, the sum here appropriated will be sufficient.

The large expenditure for the present year is due largely to the fact that for the six months ending October 1 last the fourth-class postmasters drew about one-third of a million more than was intended and than they will next year, because their salaries were based on income derived from 3-cent stamps instead of two cents.

I will say for the information of the House that the Post-Office Department has adopted as a means of ascertaining how much is required to pay salaries of postmasters 20 per cent. of the revenue. I believe some three years ago they fixed the basis at 22 per cent. Last year they fell to 20 per cent. of the revenue. If we had been guided by that basis alone it would be seen about $9,500,000 would be sufficient to pay the salaries of postmasters for the next year.

In order to provide amply for the payment of salaries of postmasters we have given a million and a quarter more than was appropriated at the last session of Congress, which I believe will be found sufficient, as the salaries of fourth-class postmasters will hereafter be based upon the receipts for 2-cent instead of 3-cent stamps. This, as I have already indicated, will show a difference between the amount expended for the current and the next year of about one-third of a million dollars.

Another item, Mr. Chairman, I shall refer to briefly, and then I will temporarily yield the floor. It is in regard to the railway mail transportation service.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question before he leaves the point he has just referred to?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure when I get through with this part of my remarks; but I prefer not to be interrupted at present.

We have practically, Mr. Chairman, made no reduction below the estimates of the Department to defray the expenses of the railway mail service, when the reduction of the rate of compensation which we make by this bill is considered. This service has grown surprisingly in the last few years. In 1874 the total cost of all the railway mail service did not reach $11,000,000. The estimates of the Department this year, ten years afterward, reach about the sum of $18,500,000.

A commission was appointed under authority of the last Congress to ascertain and report upon a plan for adjusting the compensation to railroads by which the interests of the Government might be guarded, while at the same time just compensation would be provided to the railway companies for carrying the mails. That commission spent considerable time in an examination of the subject, and have evolved a plan which in their judgment would effect a saving to the Government on account of this item of expenditure of $1,000,000 a year. But the plan is so complicated and difficult to understand that I have been unable to find any one not a member of the commission, no matter how much he may have studied the subject, who was able to determine whether it would result in an increase or a reduction of expenditures. The Committee on Appropriations, therefore, regarding it as entirely in the nature of new legislation, without evidence of retrenchment, considered it outside of the legitimate boundaries of their duties, and have omitted its consideration in the present bill, and left the question to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, where it may have such consideration as its merits demand.

I come back, sir, to the original proposition with which I set out, that we have practically appropriated every dollar that was estimated for by the Department, although I feel confident that a considerable reduction might be safely made below the amount estimated for that service. These estimates, as all must understand, can not, as a matter of course, be reduced to a mathematical demonstration. They are necessarily to a large extent conjectural. They are based largely upon a supposed percentage of increase in railway mileage and increased business as well as some other considerations.

Now, if the deductions are made from the estimates of the 5 per cent. provided for in this bill on railroad transportation generally, and 50 per cent. on land-grant railroads, it will be found that we have in reality appropriated the full amount of the estimates.

I say that we might have safely reduced the appropriation for this service far below the estimates and yet the public service would not be crippled. But the Committee on Appropriations made no attempt to reduce the amount called for by the Department below that which will result from legislation which we will ask this Congress to pass; legislation that is in the line of retrenchment and economy and is of course germane to the bill. This bill, as stated, provides that the compensation to all railway companies for transporting the mail shall be reduced 5 per cent. below the rate fixed by the present law.

In 1876 Congress reduced the basis of rating of the compensation of railroads 10 per cent. In 1878 it was still further reduced 5 per cent. That was the last reduction made for this purpose. The railroads are at present carrying passengers, express, and freights far cheaper than they were carrying them at the period of the last reduction. The cost of material, of wages, and the ordinary expense of running railroads are cheaper than they were at that period. We feel, therefore, that Congress can, without being charged with injustice to the railways, reduce this rate of compensation to the extent provided here.

The immensely growing cost of this service stares us in the face at every session of Congress. The rates paid for carrying our mail on railroads are much greater than those charged the business community for carrying its freight or express matter. The rates for carrying the freights on twelve of the principal lines of this country—four of our great trunk lines and several of our great Northwestern lines—range from only two-thirds of 1 cent per ton per mile up to 2¼ cents per ton per mile.

Mr. RYAN. They do not carry the mails on freight trains.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No——

Mr. REED. You do not fill the cars on your mail trains with the mail, do you?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not yield now to my friend.

Mr. REED. While you are going on just explain that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will explain presently. Some of the railroads receive fifty times as much for carrying the mails as they do for carrying freight. Now I will admit, sir, that they do provide better accommodation for carrying the mails than for carrying cattle and hogs or in carrying ordinary merchandise; but no greater expense is occasioned to the road than if the mail-cars contained freight only. They furnish no brakesmen or other trainmen in and about those cars; the railroad simply carries a quantity of mail in the car and the postal clerks employed upon it. Now we leave it for the House to determine whether the Government should pay fifty times as much for carrying the mails as is paid for carrying ordinary freights, which require a full corps of conductors, brakesmen, &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, comparing the cost of the railway carrying service with what it was in 1878 and what it is to-day, we have felt that we were moderate in our reduction, and that common justice to the people's Treasury demanded that we at least should insist upon some reduction of the cost of railway mail transportation. Why, sir, in 1873 the maximum cost for carrying the mail for the Government was only $300 per mile, but this year it runs up over $1,200 per mile on some roads. If you look at the cost of the star service you will see that it amounts to only 6 cents a mile, while on the railroads the service costs us rates running from less than 7 cents to 35 cents per ton per mile. I believe those are the figures given in the debates in the last session of Congress.

We have further provided in this bill that for carrying the mails on what are known as land-grant roads there shall be a reduction of 50 per cent. I refer to the roads which received large subsidies of lands. I shall not at this time enter upon the details of that question. I simply desire to call attention generally to the fact that these railroads received large bounties from the Government, in return for which their charters provide that they shall carry the mails "at such price as Congress may by law direct." Equity and justice demand that a distinction should be made between the compensation paid to railroads receiving large bounties of public lands and those railroads to which no such grants have been made. Take, for instance, the Northern Pacific. The land grant to that road is estimated by many to be worth $150,000,000. It is believed their bounty from the Government is enough to build the road, to equip it, and to turn it over to the stockholders if it is honestly built without costing the stockholders one dime, for the value of the lands is stated to average at least $3 per acre. Some of the lands on that line are the finest on the earth. It is because these roads have received such princely endowments from the Government we insist they should be compelled to carry the mails at considerably less than other roads. Congress has full power to do so under the original charters granted to them; therefore I presume the only question here for debate is as to the policy of compelling them to do so. As I have said, the charters of these railroads provide that the United States mail shall be transported by them "at such price as Congress may by law direct." The language in the Northern Pacific charter is somewhat different, but is substantially the same. I am alluding now to those roads which did not receive subsidies by loans of bonds but which did receive grants of land. The charters of bonded roads are different in this respect.

The Government has surely paid enough for this privilege of fixing the mail rates on land-grant railroads. Look at the case of the Northern Pacific, for instance. Suppose when it received its charter it had been asked the question: Will you accept the 48,000,000 acres of lands that are tendered you upon the condition that you will haul one or more mail-cars over your road with your regular passenger trains, such trains as you will ordinarily run over your road; will you accept this 48,000,000 of acres, consisting of a broad belt of land twenty miles wide along the line of your road in the States and forty miles wide along the line of your road in the Territories, with all its great privileges and rights, upon the condition that Congress may retain the power to fix the rate of compensation for carrying the mail at such price as it may deem equitable and just? Is there one upon this floor so simple-minded as to believe that the railroad company would have declined the bounty and the charter thus tendered them if it knew Congress would exercise this power? And is there one so cunning here who will be able to induce this House to believe that the road would have repudiated such a condition if it had fully understood the character of the contract which it entered into? The fact that the charter was accepted with this plain provision in it answers the inquiries, and leaves no ground for dispute.

One other observation in regard to this provision. The bill provides that what is known as the Union Pacific system, embracing I think five roads which received subsidies of bonds and lands, shall be brought under the operation of the law reducing the rate of compensation on all the other railroads of the country.

Mr. RYAN. Oh, no; you do not do any such thing.

Mr. HORR. You are wrong.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friends are very sadly mistaken.

Mr. RYAN. I do not think we are.

Mr. HORR. Ask Judge HOLMAN about that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to correct both gentlemen. I repeat my proposition that we have subjected the Union Pacific system, consisting of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific and the roads belonging to that system—we have brought them under the operation of the general reduction that we have provided for all the railroads of the country.

Mr. RYAN. The 5 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. You have not done that specifically. You have made that provision apply to all roads generally, but have not attempted to amend the charter of the Union Pacific in that respect at all, which would be necessary before you can reduce the rates of compensation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairmen, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-nine minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I repeat the statement again and propose to demonstrate its truth, and I think my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] will admit it to be so. The terms of the provision of this bill, which I have not time just now to read and criticise, do amend and alter the charter of the Union Pacific road and all the other roads connected with what is known as the Union Pacific system, so as to subject them to this 5 per cent. reduction and the reductions of 1876 and 1878. An attempt was made in the last Congress to do this, and the House stood by the Committee on Appropriations and brought those railroads under the operation of these general reductions of the cost of railroad transportation of the mails. But in the Senate it seems that these companies had influence enough to have that provision of the bill of last year stricken out; and to-day the Union Pacific system is left in a position where it insists it is entitled to charge twice as much for carrying the mails as is paid to any other railroad in the country. It seems that, under the peculiar wording of a provision in the original charter of these roads, the Supreme Court has held that a general law reducing the rate of transportation on railroads generally will not apply to the roads of this system unless the act specifically manifests that intention. In other words, from the language used by the court the inference is that it is necessary in order to reduce the charges made by these roads for carrying the mails that Congress shall specifically manifest an intention to reach the original charters of the roads and to amend and modify them for the purpose I have indicated.

I feel sure the language employed in this bill is sufficiently specific to leave open no question as to the intention of Congress to place these roads which have received such princely bounties upon a footing with roads that received no bounty whatever. We seek by this bill to exercise no greater degree of power than it may be fairly inferred the Supreme Court intended to declare that Congress has the power to do. We do specifically amend and alter the charters of these roads in order to bring them under the operation of the general 5 per cent. reduction applied to all other railroads in the country. We do not reduce the rate of transportation upon that system of roads 50 per cent. as we have done upon the purely land-grant roads, for the reason that the language of the charters will not allow us to exercise the same power over this system of roads as over the purely land-grant roads. The charters of this system limit the power of Congress to establishing what is termed a "reasonable rate of compensation," to be ascertained perhaps when the Government and the roads can not agree by judicial tribunals. But in the charters of the Northern Pacific, the Atlantic Pacific, and the other ordinary land-grant roads, Congress has specifically or substantially reserved the power to establish just such a rate of compensation for carrying the mails as it may in its judgment deem just and proper.

I do not wish to say anything further now, but will reserve the remainder of my time until I have heard from the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] a question.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it does not come out of my time, I am willing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to gentlemen that ample time will be allowed for debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I do not want any time for debate.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in the outset that I dislike very much to be compelled to criticise a bill coming from a committee upon which I serve, but I feel compelled to call in question some of the items in this bill. One would naturally think that in making an appropriation for such a purpose as carrying the mails and the delivery of letters there certainly would be a spirit of at least ordinary liberality exercised by our committee. At all events I would not expect that the Indiana doctrine of economy would be applied to it. [Laughter.]

But I do think that I can convince both sides of this House that this bill is drawn not in the interest of the public service but in many respects it will simply work the ruin of that service, and very much impair the efficiency now reached in the carrying and distribution of mail matter. In doing this I shall be compelled to refer more or less to statistics, to give you more or less facts and figures, because I claim that the provisions of this bill can be largely explained by a simple matter of addition and multiplication, whereas the only branch of mathematics known in the Indiana system is that of subtraction. [Laughter.]

To begin with, this bill provides for this branch of the public service, first, by reducing the regular estimates more than three and a half millions of dollars. Let us, however, take the provisions of the bill up in their order; I mean those items which seem to me objectionable. In 1879–'80 the deficiency in the item for the pay of postmasters was only $158,407. In 1880–'81 the deficiency in that item went up to $798,742; in 1881–'82 it went up to $1,164,676; and in 1882–'83 there was a deficiency of $1,515,394. We expended for this branch of the service in 1882–'83 $10,315,394. For the year ending June 30, 1884, we appropriated for this branch of the service the sum of $9,250,000.

Judging from the expenditures up to this time, there will be in this branch of the service for this year a deficiency of $2,000,000. Consequently the actual amount which the postmasters of the country will cost for the year ending June 30, 1884, will be $11,250,000.

Now, this bill appropriates for this branch of the service for the coming fiscal year 1884–'85 the sum of $10,500,000; that is, $750,000 less than this branch of the service will cost for the current fiscal year.

Now, I am aware that this failure to appropriate does not strike down the service of the Post-Office Department. It differs in that respect from some other provisions of the bill, as you will see further on. This simply insures a deficiency for this branch of the service. Understand me, it does not make any difference how much money we appropriate for this purpose, the law fixes the salaries and percentages which the postmasters shall receive, and they will get it whether we appropriate it in this bill or not. If we do not appropriate enough now, that will simply require a deficiency bill hereafter to make up the amount.

Mr. LONG. The postmasters will deduct from their receipts enough for their compensation.

Mr. HORR. Yes, they will deduct it from their receipts, and of course will get their pay as they go along; but Congress will have to appropriate enough to pay for it some time in the future. What I desire to say is that the great objection I make to this clause is that it goes counter to the doctrine which is so dear to the heart of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who in season and out of season lectures this side of the House, and his own side also, against making deficiencies, against spending a dollar more than the appropriation bill provides for. But here you have a bill making necessarily a deficiency of two and a half millions of dollars. Now, that gentleman should either get over his furor against deficiencies or he should appropriate money enough to pay the bills and so avoid deficiencies. That is a fact, is it not? This bill does not do that, for the only provision to offset this large deficiency of two and a half million is the cutting down to $4,000 a year each of the salaries of nine postmasters, as my friend from Illinois has just said. There are nine postmasters who now receive salaries varying from $5,000 to $8,000 per year each, the postmaster at New York city getting $8,000 and the others getting $6,000, with the exception of the postmaster at Washington, who receives $5,000. Upon the salaries of these nine postmasters at these great cities the Committee on Appropriations, to offset this deficiency of $2,500,000 which will necessarily occur in this branch of the service, have made a reduction of $19,000. This is the only reduction that can possibly apply to make up this deficiency.

I am opposed to this reduction. I do not believe that the majority of this House, as business men, are in favor of reducing the postmaster at New York city to a salary of $4,000. Look at the millions and millions of revenue that he handles; look at the money-orders that he controls and must account for, amounting to many millions of dollars each year. I say that the postmasterships in these large cities ought to be worth all they now receive, and we ought not to cut down their salaries at all. I do not believe it is real economy to pay such men as are needed in these places so small a sum that first-class men will not accept these positions.

Do you know that the postal revenues of the nine cities mentioned aggregate $12,326,000 per annum? One-quarter of all the receipts of the Post-Office Department come from the nine cities represented by these postmasters. Over $8,000,000 is the amount of the net proceeds in eight of them, leaving out Washington, where the receipts are comparatively small, though we all know that the business of the Washington office is enormous; and it requires a first-class man to manage and run it well, and we should pay him something like an adequate price for his work.

But think of cutting down the salary of the postmaster at New York city, Chicago, Saint Louis, Baltimore, and the other large points, where they collect these enormous sums, to so small an amount as $4,000 a year—not as much as a man who is able to manage properly those great offices could command in any ordinary work of life.

A MEMBER. Not so much as Congressmen get.

Mr. HORR. Not so much as a Congressman gets; but I am not going to be led into a belittlement of the worth of our services. [Laughter.] I believe the bill in this respect is defective, and that upon sound business principles that provision as to these nine postmasters should be stricken out.

The next provision in this bill to which I object is the clause cutting down clerk-hire in the post-offices; that is, the money needed for the compensation of clerks in the various post-offices where they distribute and separate the mails. In 1883 we appropriated for this purpose $4,367,000; in 1884, $4,475,000, and all of this money will be expended before the end of the year.

In 1883 there were four hundred and seventy-eight new allowances made for clerk-hire, but so great is the pressure for an increase of this clerical help that 2,604 applications from offices in the United States have already been filed where they need more assistance to separate and distribute the mails, and they can not be furnished. Yet this bill has given not a single dollar more this year for this service than was given last year. No money is allowed for the increase in this service, when all must admit that an increase is demanded.

There are 1,732 separating offices alone in the United States. These separating offices are, many of them, at points where the postmasters get but little salary. They distribute the mails to the different routes; and unless this work is done by a paid clerk it can not be done at all. Yet the Committee on Appropriations, with an estimate before them of $4,900,000 made by the Department, and a statement that it can not get along with a cent less—and this amount is only an increase of $125,000 over last year—have cut out this increase entirely, so that this bill does not give a dollar for these new clerks scattered all over the country, who are needed to facilitate the mail service. Only think, with the increase of work being as certain as death, not a dollar given to meet the increase! Surely the members of this House who know the needs of the service all over our growing country will never consent to so small an appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to a subject in reference to which this bill is particularly defective. Did I not know the genial nature of my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and his natural kindness of heart, I should have supposed that he framed this clause in express malice against the free-delivery system of the country. I wish the gentleman would give me his attention for a moment. I think that perhaps I know something about this carrier business which will interest him. I certainly can tell him some facts that should attract his attention.

In 1883 we appropriated $3,200,000 for this service, in 1884 $3,500,000. Now the gentleman from Illinois intimated in his remarks, I believe, that the committee had cut this service down only about $200,000. Of course if the gentleman did make this statement he made it inadvertently because he knows there was a mistake in the estimate. I hold in my hand a letter from the Postmaster-General——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend will excuse me. I said nothing whatever about that item of the bill.

Mr. HORR. Very well; I do not blame the gentleman for not talking about it. Let me give the facts. The printed estimate was $200,000 less than it should have been. I received from the hands of the gentleman himself a letter from the Postmaster-General in which he states that in the Book of Estimates he had made a mistake by omitting $180,000 for new service and $20,000 for an item which was by mistake left out—that the estimate should have been $4,000,000 instead of $3,800,000.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1884.

SIR: I find, on referring to my annual report for 1883, page 59, that in stating the amount which will be required for the free-delivery service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1884, two important items were omitted, namely, $180,000 for additional letter-carriers in cities where the service is now in operation, and $20,000 for additional incidental expenses, making $200,000.

I therefore advise that the estimate for this service for the next fiscal year be increased from $3,800,000 to $4,000,000.

The considerations which lead me to ask for this large amount are as follows: This service has been extended within about a year to 47 additional cities, making the present number 159. These cities have an aggregate population, according to the census of 1880, of about 10,000,000, and employ 3,888 letter-carriers at the present time. They yielded last year one-half of the entire gross revenue of the Department, and from postages on local matter alone $1,021,594 in excess of the total cost of this branch of the service. The amount required is also largely increased by the act of August 2, 1882, increasing the pay of auxiliary carriers from $400 to $600 per annum, and requiring the promotion of carriers to the next higher grade after one year's service, involving an increased expense in each individual case of $200 in the first-class free-delivery cities and $250 in the second-class cities. The per cent. of increase in the cost of the service for the fiscal year 1882 was 4.93 against 20.95 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, this large increase being due in great part to the act above cited.

I therefore recommend the appropriation of $4,000,000 as the probable cost of the service for the next fiscal year.

Very respectfully, &c.,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. SAML. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The real estimate for the carrier service, then, should have been and really is as far as this bill is concerned $4,000,000.

What are the facts? They cut that estimate down $400,000, giving only $3,600,000 for this service.

I wish to say to my friend from Illinois there are to-day 1,985 carriers who by law are entitled to $1,000 each, 891 who by law are entitled to $850 each, 367 who by law are entitled to $800 each, and 645 who are entitled to $600 each. That is, they are entitled under the law passed at a former session of Congress each to the amount I have indicated. They are graded now as you understand under the law and amount of salary fixed.

I wish the gentleman from Illinois would give me his attention.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. Their salary amounts to $3,422,950 this year, and the increase, which by law we are compelled to pay next year, is $200,000 more, so that we have to pay under the law $3,622,950 next year.

That is, Mr. Chairman, to pay the wages fixed by law for the carriers now in service will cost next year $42,950 more than this bill appropriates for the entire service of that year. Instead of providing for increase of carriers, this would compel the Department to turn out of the service orty men who are now in the work.

I wish the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] were here, for he would remember very well how hard he worked to procure extra pay to these carriers and to fix their promotion by law. They earn the amount so fixed if any men in the United States service earn their money, as they travel on foot from fourteen to twenty miles a day. Their labors are incessant and excessive, and we have fixed by law how they should be promoted and what amount of money those in each grade should receive, and then the Committee on Appropriations now bring in a bill which does not appropriate money enough to pay under the law for the men who are now in the service, saying nothing about the increase natural to this service and incidental expenses.

What does this service actually need? In addition to the men now employed it needs two or three hundred more letter-carriers to make up for the growth of the cities in which free delivery has been already established. A few are needed in many of the smaller cities and a large number in large cities in order to make this carrier system perfect. Is there a gentleman here on either side of the House who has a city in his district where this service exists which does not need more carriers? The city in which I live needs three more at least. Two wards of that city to-day have no carrier service in them and never have had, because we had no way of getting the extra men.

I have been informed from the Post-Office Department that application has already been made for three hundred and twenty-two new carriers during the last year. They have allowed two hundred and eight; one hundred and twenty-four more have been asked for, but they have not been allowed. That was up to October, but since October there have been applied for sixty more, making in all one hundred and eighty-four asked for at this time and not supplied. And at the close of the year many more will be applied for. So that, Mr. Chairman, three hundred additional carriers are absolutely needed to carry on efficiently the work which ought to be done.

There is also an item of $130,000 to pay for incidental expenses. Those incidental expenses are for horses, where there are mounted carriers, and for horses and wagons where the amount of mail is so great they can not handle it on foot; also for letter-boxes, putting them up in the streets, keeping them painted, and for the bags and pouches the men carry their mail in. Last year there was expended for this item, including pay of inspectors, $116,834.88. The Department asks this year for only $130,000, which is a small increase. Again, it will cost at least $50,000 to put the system into operation in cities where it is already asked for. There are to-day applications on file for twenty-nine new offices where the law permits them to have the carrier or free-delivery system.

Mr. LONG. Give the name of some of them.

Mr. HORR. I have not the list here. It costs about $3,500 the first year to establish this system in a new city. All the large cities are growing. Any man living in New York, Chicago, San Francisco, or Boston knows each year brings with it a great addition of work for these letter-carriers; and this work, if it is sustained at all, has to be sustained by increasing the appropriation adequately to meet the increase of work. In these cities which now have the free-delivery service (and one hundred and forty-nine have it at this time) we collected last year in these one hundred and forty-nine cities nearly or quite one-half of the money collected under the postal service of the United States. We collected from the local mail alone on drop letters, &c., $1,021,000 more than the carrier system cost. That is, from the extra matter mailed in these cities and to be delivered without leaving them was collected that amount of surplus over the cost of this service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Postmaster-General says that of the one hundred and fifty-four free-delivery offices only fourteen in the country are self-sustaining.

Mr. HORR. I understand that. There are a large number of these offices in which the local matter is not enough to pay for this service, perhaps all of them with the exception of fourteen, as the gentleman states. But my statement is, that taken as a whole they do pay this large surplus. And my friend from Illinois must not forget that every one of these offices has an income of over $20,000 per year; for unless they had that amount they could not have received the service. I know population alone could be great enough to allow the service, but I do not think there is an instance where they have ever had the proper population to get the service that the receipts were not over $20,000.

About one-half of the revenues of the United States derived from postage are paid by the cities which have the free-delivery system. Why, then, Mr. Chairman, strike down this system? Why deal a blow at it to prevent it being carried out in good faith? Simply because the local mail matter does not pay is no reason why we should not have the service, Our postal service is not based on that theory. Do you know that in the United States to-day there are many States in which the service is not self-sustaining? How many States do you suppose there are that pay the entire expenses of their own mail service? Out of the States and Territories, including the District of Columbia, there are only seventeen that pay their own expenses. In thirty-one States and Territories we do not collect enough postage from their citizens to pay for their own service, and I say it without any unkindness there is not to-day a State south of Mason and Dixon's line that pays its postal expenses. There never was one. Why? It is no fault of theirs. Their population is necessarily not a letter-writing population, many of them having never learned to read and write on account of the peculiar relations they have sustained toward each other in the past. But does it follow that because a system does not pay in a State or States that those States are not entitled to have the service? Why, nobody will for a moment make such a claim as that.

There is a shortage in these thirty-two States and Territories of $4,707,000 for the year 1883. The people of those States fell short that amount of writing letters enough and taking newspapers enough to pay the expenses of the mail service during that year; whereas there is an excess in the other fourteen States of $7,122,000 over and above the cost of the service. New York State alone had an excess of $2,813,000. Little—and I speak it without any intention of belittling its Representatives on this floor—little Massachusetts had over $1,111,000 surplus. Not a New England State—and some of you sometimes attack them upon the ground of their being "old fogies;" you like to make sport of them; and yet the people in each one of them wrote letters enough in 1883 and took enough newspapers and paid the postage on them to pay all the expenses of their mail service and have a large surplus to help the people of other States who did not write letters enough to pay their way.

Mr. LONG. Some in Michigan.

Mr. HORR. No, my friend; Michigan paid her own way. Though a new State, her people read and write. To the gentleman from Illinois I will say that his own State is over $800,000 in excess. But our mail system should be extended without regard to whether any particular locality pays or not. The controlling question is, what does the business of a place demand; what are the needs of the people in each locality?

I say, Mr. Chairman, that in view of all of these facts this carrier system should be sustained and extended. The people in those cities where it has been introduced are asking nothing but justice and right in its continuance and support. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois who intimates that some of these smaller cities do not pay the cost of the service by their local mail matter, that under the law there are to-day forty-odd cities which are entitled to it. I say that these smaller but growing towns are as much entitled to this service as the large cities that have this large surplus of revenue from their local matter. Do not, I beg of you, cut down this service in this manner. Do not begrudge this convenience to the people of our large towns. I would carry the mail into every nook and corner of the United States, no matter if some people in the cities are taxed a little more than their share, for they can afford to pay it, because with the mails go business, intelligence, civilization. This bill will cripple this important free-delivery service. The full four million asked for is needed and should be given.

The next item in this bill to which I desire to refer is the provision for rent, light, and fuel. In 1883 we appropriated $450,000 for this item. In 1884 this was cut down to $440,000.

The amount of $450,000 I have said is just the amount which was appropriated by the act of 1883. Why the last House decreased that item I do not know. The Department says that there will be certainly a deficiency, and that they will need every dollar of the $480,000 asked for to light the offices and purchase the fuel, &c. I think, of all things, that we should be careful and not shut the light out from anywhere. When the proper time comes I trust no one will oppose the raising of the amount so as to provide amply for these necessities. They need every dollar. We should not compel them to shut down and leave the employés in cold and darkness.

I now come to the railway mail service. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General estimated that it would take $13,735,216 for this service. The Postmaster-General cut that estimate down to $12,750,000; thus a reduction of the estimate was made by him to the large amount of $985,216.

This bill then again comes in and cuts it down to $11,700,000; being a reduction of $2,035,216 below the estimate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has special charge of this service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me to call attention to the fact that we have taken the estimates of the Postmaster-General as the basis, and after deducting 5 per cent. for general railway transportation and 50 per cent. for the land-grant roads, it just leaves what the Postmaster-General estimated it would take?

Mr. HORR. I am aware that in cutting off 5 per cent. from these railways and then undertaking to cut off from the land-grant railroads 50 per cent. more it makes a reduction something like the amount stated by my friend. But I also make the prediction now that there will be even then a deficiency of over one and one-half million dollars on this item.

The gentleman perhaps had not had his attention called—I certainly had not had mine—to the fact that we are now compelled to pay $600,000 under the decision of the court to the Union Pacific Railroad for their leased roads, which heretofore has been simply put to their credit and has never been taken out of this fund appropriated for this item. Under the decision of the court, as I understand it, we are compelled now to use that $600,000 out of this fund.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the gentleman will find the Department in making its estimates took that into consideration.

Mr. HORR. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General did take it into account. I think you will find you have left it out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the Postmaster-General himself took it into consideration in fixing his basis, and we took his figures, less the 5 per cent. and the 50 per cent reduction.

Mr. HORR. Now let us come for a moment to a discussion of that part of the bill. I do not complain particularly about the cutting down of 5 per cent. on the railroads, although I do not know whether it can be justified on good business principles or not. But I do invite the attention of this House to the further provision of this bill which steps in and cuts down 50 per cent. on every railroad in the United States that has received any land grant from the Government. First the bill reduces the pay of all the railroads 5 per cent., and then provides that the land-grant roads shall receive only one-half of the sum left. Why not every road as well as the land-grant roads? The bill leaves out the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific, because under their charters we can not reach them. On what principle is this clause inserted? Because in the law which chartered these roads there is this provision: "That the United States mail shall at all times be transported on the said road and branches under the direction of the Post-Office Department at such price as Congress may by law direct."

Now, what I claim is that under that provision you have not the right to fix a just amount for the compensation of all the railroads of the United States and then split that amount right into two parts and make these companies take half of it. It means, if it means anything, that you shall fix such a rate as in conscience and fair dealing they ought to receive and then pay them all of it. The rate fixed for other roads they are entitled to. If a man comes to me to hire out and I say, "What will you charge me for doing such a job?" and he says, "I will do the work and then you may fix the amount after I have done it," does that give me the right to cut him down to nothing for his work or to cut him down to even half price? Why, most certainly not. It gives me the right simply to fix a good, square, fair rate and pay him that amount, and if I refuse to do it he can go into the proper court and compel me to pay him what the work is worth. Am I not correct as to the law?

Now, what about these land-grant railroads? Why do you seek to cut them down 50 per cent.? Where are these roads that you strike by this bill and what are they? Why, sir, with the exception of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific, which are left out, there are fifty land-grant railroads in the United States. I have the list of them here. Among them I doubt if there are ten that are paying their expenses to-day and interest on their bonded debt. Was the land given to these roads to cheapen the price of their mail service? No such thought ever entered the head of any one. The idea that stimulated the passage of the act giving land grants to these roads was this: that it would enable the building of roads in sparsely populated Territories, through countries which would not pay, and would thereby enable us to develop the country and bring into market large tracts of worthless lands; I mean lands that without the road would not be settled upon. Only look at it. Here are roads scattered all over the United States. There are in all about 11,000 miles over and above the mileage of the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, and the Northern Pacific. Of these roads twenty-three run through the Southern States; twenty-seven run through the Northern States; four or five, I think, are in Florida. They are scattered all over the Southern and Western country. If you examine them you will find that the parties who put their money into them are not to-day receiving and never have received one cent of income or dividend on the money put into the great bulk of them. In my own State I know that to be the fact. I do not believe a land-grant road in the Upper Peninsula has ever made a dividend. I doubt if a road in the State has on its original stock.

But what kind of an anomaly do you gentlemen present on the Democratic side of the House? I see my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is here. I want to call his attention to this fact. You have cut down in this bill the land-grant roads on what they earn for carrying the mails to 50 cents on the dollar. Your colleague from Indiana [Mr. COBB], whom I do not see in his seat, is in another room in this Capitol taking these same land grants away from those very roads. One Indiana Democrat is cutting down what they earn on account of having the lands; and another Indiana Democrat is taking away these very same lands.

Mr. ANDERSON. Which they did not earn.

Mr. HORR. Oh, but they are forfeiting lands already earned. Is it fair and just to cut down their wages on account of land grants and then take the lands away?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Public Lands Committee has not taken away any land that any land-grant railroad has earned. It is not the Democratic policy to take away lands they have earned. You can not blame them for that.

Mr. HORR. We can tell better about that when we come to examine their bills. I think you will then find that my statement is correct.

Of course the reports are not all on file yet, but I do not have to go into the secret transactions of the committee; I can take the files of the House and show that they are trying in one committee to take these land grants away, and in this bill we are trying to cut off their pay because they have had these same land grants. But I do not oppose this provision on that account. I oppose it because it is not just, is not equitable, and because I do not believe the law making these grants gives Congress the right to make this distinction against these roads.

What is the fair thing to do? I say that a little road which has been built through the woods and is struggling to maintain its existence is entitled to receive pay for what it does for the Government. The franchises of all the great roads in the country are worth ten dollars where these land grants are worth one, for the great roads run through a country which is populous and which furnishes a large amount of business. Take the New York Central; you do not touch that any more than you do a hundred other roads in the East and West, North and South. Yet those roads are making twenty dollars where these smaller land-grant roads are making one. Yet without any discrimination you cut the compensation of these land-grant roads down to 50 cents on the dollar, and in that way prevent them from getting pay for what they do. I say it is unjust, it is unfair. I say it is unbecoming the dignity of a great nation thus to deal with these roads. We should deal with them in the same spirit of fairness that one individual would deal with another; that is my idea about it.

Mr. BUDD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. BUDD. The gentleman says that the New York Central and other Eastern roads have been making more money than the roads in the West. Is it not the fact that because the other great trunk lines of the East would not pool their earnings it (the New York Central) cut down its rates in order to force them into the pool, until the profits of all were merely nominal; in fact the New York Central, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Canadian, and the other roads lost money? But at the same time the Central Pacific Railroad, a land-grant road, made enough money to build the Southern Pacific through the Territory of Arizona, and to gobble up the Atlantic and the Pacific out of the profits of its land grant and high rates of its freights and fares.

Mr. HORR. To answer that question, Mr. Chairman, would take me about two days [laughter], because I would be required to go into the whole railroad question. I will say to my friend, however, that as I understand it the New York Central has paid on its stock from 10 to 14 per cent a year. Is not that so? Besides, the Central Pacific that the gentleman mentions is not affected by this bill at all. It is protected by its charter. I have looked this list of land-grant roads through, and I say there is not a land-grant road in the Southern States that has ever paid a dollar of dividends to the men who have furnished the money to build it. They may receive some in time; I think they will; but those roads are built through a country which does not now pay. The lands were given them because the country was new and the roads could not at first pay.

I know it is easy to cry out against these railroads; but I say that if you will examine into them one by one you will find that this bill will work great injustice to the poorer roads of the country, to roads which have been built by Eastern capital, and from which not a single cent has been received for the capital invested. I say this House should be slow to ingraft such a provision upon any of its legislation. But I must hurry on.

The next thing is a small matter; I do not complain of it much. I refer to the clause making appropriation for the steamboat service. The estimates for the next fiscal year called for $625,000 for this service. This bill gives $600,000, cutting off $25,000 of the estimate. I think that is a mistake. The bill gives the same amount, as I remember it, which the bill of last year gave for this service.

Why is this extra $25,000 needed? Is there a gentleman from Florida here? I do not see one. Let me say that there has been an application to the Post-Office Department, and that Department has acted upon it favorably. I suppose it will be a good thing to give new and faster steamboat service on the Saint John's River in Florida. It is desired to have a fast mail from New York to Key West. There is a daily mail between Jacksonville and Palatka, and there is a slow daily mail on the Saint John's River between Palatka and Enterprise. This extra appropriation is for the purpose of putting a steamboat on that river to carry the mail, stopping at only two places, and thereby giving a fast mail on that river. There is another new route wanted on Lake Michigan, from Harbor Springs to Beaver Island.

This extra $25,000 is simply to secure a mail on those two routes, and also to enable the Government to increase this service in times of overflow. It was found during the overflow on the Mississippi last year that a large number of post-offices were cut off, so that mails could not get to them in the usual way. For a few days or a few weeks steamboat mail service was required in order to carry the mails to them. Now, this bill does not give a dollar for such service. The Postmaster-General recommended this increase of appropriation for emergencies of that kind. For instance, no longer ago than the other day New Richmond had to get steamboat service for her mails for the reason that the water there was so high as to prevent the cars from coming to that place. This matter of $25,000 then is to secure a faster mail on that route in Florida, a new one on Lake Michigan, and to meet these emergencies of overflow as I have indicated.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. NICHOLLS. The gentleman speaks of a fast mail service from Jacksonville to Palatka. Allow me to state that the Government has not paid one cent for the mail service from Charleston to Jacksonville for the last year; it is done by the railroad without compensation to accommodate that section of the country.

Mr. HORR. Do I understand the gentleman to say that we ought not to provide for payment on that route?

Mr. NICHOLLS. No. I say the railroads ought to be paid; but they have not been.

Mr. HORR. And we can not pay them, if we pass this bill as reported. That is the very thing I am complaining of—such work is needed, but this bill does not provide the proper pay for doing it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has my friend stated the fact that the Postmaster-General did not make any estimate for this branch of the service; that he left out of the estimates entirely any appropriation for special mail facilities?

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General did ask for this $25,000. This is not for special service at all; it is for steamboat service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am speaking of Postmaster-General Gresham, the head of the Department, not of any subordinate. We look to the Postmaster-General for estimates.

Mr. HORR. Why, sir, the Postmaster-General did include in his estimate this $25,000 for this very purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For special mail facilities on railroads?

Mr. HORR. Not at all; I am speaking of the steamboat service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then the gentleman will excuse me; I misunderstood him.

Mr. HORR. I left the railroad subject some time ago, when the gentleman was out of his seat. I am undertaking now to show that this estimated sum of $25,000 for the steamboat service ought to have been appropriated, that it was needed, and should not have been left out, and I think the members who have followed me are satisfied that I am right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the star-route service. In this service the committee have allowed indirectly the full amount asked for by the Postmaster-General. I am glad that my friend from Illinois is now in his seat. If I make any statement on this point which is not correct I wish that he would stop me. In order to cover up the exact amount appropriated by this bill, in order to make it seem smaller than it really is, and thus to deceive the people as to the amount that the bill actually carries, the committee propose to reappropriate $1,000,000 out of a fund that was saved from this service in 1883. If you will look at the bill you will find it carries an appropriation of $4,600,000, and $1,000,000 reappropriated.

Now look at the footing at the end of the bill, and you will find that this $1,000,000 reappropriated is left out. Why? What for, I mean? I would be very glad to have you tell me right here.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will do so. All the revenue of the Post-Office Department is set aside specially to defray the expenses of that Department, if it is sufficient to do so. If it is not sufficient, the Department calls for an appropriation for the deficiency, to be paid out of the general Treasury. We found that in 1883 the expenditures of that Department were more than $2,000,000 less than the amount appropriated for the Department. We have, therefore, lying idle to the credit of that Department $2,000,000. Now in this bill we have reappropriated $1,000,000 of this fund standing to the credit of the Department, in order to avoid the necessity, if there should be a deficiency, of having to make appropriation out of the general Treasury.

Mr. HORR. Under the law, that $2,000,000, on the 1st day of next July, has to go back into the general fund; does it not?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No; if my friend will look at the statute he will find that the amount lies there to the credit of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HORR. But at the end of two years it goes right back to the general fund.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend is mistaken.

Mr. HORR. I am not mistaken. That money by operation of law goes back into the Treasury at the end of two years. Then why reappropriate it? Why did you not simply appropriate the whole amount required in the usual regular way?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For the reason that we wanted to give and have given every dollar that the Department asked for the star-route service—$4,600,000; but we have also made available $1,000,000, which was left over after the exposure of the star-route thieves. It was found that in one year we could honestly reduce the expenditures of that Department $2,000,000. Now, after the thieves have been exposed, and after it has been found that the Government could save $2,000,000, that amount lies in the Treasury to the credit of the Department; and we have appropriated $1,000,000 of that amount.

Mr. HORR. Why did you not say, then, at the end of your bill, "$45,000,000 appropriated and $1,000,000 reappropriated," making $46,000,000 carried by this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You may put it in your speech or have it printed in the bill, if you please. That is not a part of the bill. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. HORR. But the bill as it now is does not speak the truth.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill as it is tells the exact truth. It says that we appropriate $4,600,000, and in addition reappropriate $1,000,000 which was saved from the thieves.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, let me ask my friend if ever in the history of this Government an appropriation of this kind was ever before made in a Post-Office appropriation bill? Never; and the gentleman well knows it; and the footings at the end of the bill are simply intended to mislead as to the amount actually appropriated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to my friend that I can bring instances here showing that Republican Congresses, one after another, have reappropriated unexpended money lying in the Treasury.

Mr. HORR. Why, Mr. Chairman, if a Republican Congress ever reappropriated money of this kind and in this way they committed a blunder.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me say to my friend that at the very last session a Republican Congress reappropriated $15,000,000 for the pension fund.

Mr. HORR. That may have been done in the pension bill for some special reason; I can not stop to talk about that now; but I do say that if any such case as this can be found, then the Republicans did wrong, blundered. Admit, if you please, that they made precisely this same mistake, which I much doubt, has the Democratic party got into such a condition that it can never get any better except by imitating our blunders? Does it improve you gentlemen to imitate our mistakes? [Laughter.] Let me suggest that if you will imitate our virtues you will improve a great deal faster.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We can not find any virtues to imitate.

Mr. HORR. You can not find any? Why?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No; we can not find any virtues in the Republican party deserving of imitation.

Mr. HORR. Why? Permit me to tell you why. There are some people who are color-blind and can not discover or do not know the difference between the beautiful colors of nature and the most somber-looking things in the world; but it does not follow that nature is not all covered over with beauty simply because they do not see it. So because you can not see the virtues of the Republican party, my friend, it does not follow that none exist. Why, sir, they are plentiful, thickly strown all along our pathway for twenty-six years last past. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The trouble with you gentlemen is you seem to be happy only when you can spy out some mistake of ours, and then you imitate that and cry out, "Oh, we are virtuous now, because we are doing just as you Republicans did!" [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me for a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly; for any kind of a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman from Michigan consider the star-route service one of the virtues and beauties of his party?

Mr. HORR. One of its beauties, certainly. It is as important a service to-day as there is in the country, and one trouble is, we are getting it done too cheaply, as I will show in a moment. True, we have had some bad work in connection with it, and the Republican party, unlike yours, took after the thieves, smoked them out, and saved two millions of dollars in one year by doing it. You have no such record as that in your past history clear back to Jefferson, and that is as far as any of you go. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We had no such star-route record as that of the Republican party, and we thank God for it.

Mr. HORR. A man whose memory is full of Tweed and his Democratic associates don't want to lecture our party because abuses crept into this service which were stopped the moment they were discovered. We expose and turn out our rascals. When have you done as much?

But that, Mr. Chairman, has nothing to do with the Post-Office appropriation bill. [Laughter.] I must hasten on.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, that these star routes could be let in a different way. I agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that we are to-day not getting the best star-route service possible. The letting is so done that combinations are formed all over the United States, and these companies or combinations get the contracts originally, and then relet these routes at so low a rate as to materially injure the men who do the work. Let me be fully understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HORR. I did not suppose I had occupied so much time, and I ask permission of the committee to finish what I had prepared to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended, and I will make that motion—that be be permitted to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HORR. I can not tell, but I will not unnecessarily consume the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, what I was about to say is that the present system is in such shape that at the letting of these star-route contracts the routes are largely captured by a lot of combinations in different parts of the United States. They get these contracts and then sublet them at ruinous rates, and thus compel the service to be done for a great deal less than it is really worth. That necessarily gives us poor service, as is always the case where men work for poor pay.

I have studied this question with some care to see if it were not possible to remedy the difficulty in this bill. I found no remedy possible. I do not think there can be any remedy without increasing expenditures, and that we could not do on an appropriation bill, because it would require us to change existing law. There is a bill now before this House which I think in a measure will remedy this difficulty. What we should aim to do is to arrange it so that the men who do the carrying of the mail shall get the pay for the work done. You will be astonished to find that about two-thirds of the star routes in the United States are sublet, and these combinations get thousands of dollars, if not hundreds of thousands, and get it without doing one single chore of the work. To avoid this I think we will have to pay more money, but it ought to be done, in my judgment, even if it costs more money. At least there would be some recompense to me for the extra cost if the money could all go into the pockets of the men who perform the service.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Allow me, before the gentleman leaves this point, to ask him this question.

Mr. HORR. Certainly, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is the gentleman from Michigan aware of the fact that at the letting which took place on the 1st of the present month there were numbers of these star routes for which there was not a single local bidder?

Mr. HORR. I knew my friend from Kentucky would be on his feet just as soon as I came to this particular point of the star-route service.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like, with the gentleman's permission, to proceed a little further, and ask him another question.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman's district is largely represented by these combinations. In my examination I have looked them up and found such to be the case.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope that the gentleman from Michigan, since he has chosen to make that statement in this House, will allow me to make a further statement.

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. My district will not show a star-route thief, while the Post-Office Department will show quite a number of them. The combinations or contractors in my district, to which the gentleman from Michigan referred, have saved thousands of dollars to this Government.

Mr. HORR. Are you done?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The process which he proposes will not cheapen the service and he does not claim that it will. Nor will the shutting out of general bidders and giving a monopoly of the contract business to local bidders furnish an improved service for the people in my judgment. It will be in the interest, however, of a few liverymen, who will take the place of the general bidders and form local combinations which will increase the expenses of the service. Mail contractors are as important in my opinion to the efficiency of the mail service as drummers are to the commerce of the country.

Mr. HORR. Well, I am in danger of forgetting the first part of the question before you get to the last part [laughter], but I will endeavor to answer the gentleman's question as I go on. I did not intend to go into the details of this business. His constituents—and there are combinations elsewhere than in his district, I am frank to admit—so far as I know, have never done any stealing. I do not think they have ever stolen anything; but they have combined together, and under the present law a postmaster here in Washington, for instance, or in the State where these parties live, in the vicinity of where my friend lives in Kentucky, for instance, can certify to their bond. Now, they get together and look over all of the mail-routes in the United States which are advertised to be let. They figure out that they can perform the service at so much per mile. They make a statement, accompanied by their bid, that they know the conditions of that route and the service needed, which statement is pretty nearly stretching the truth—that is as near as I expect a man from my friend's district can come—and they file their bid. How do they do that? Mr. Chairman, they have learned human nature. They are shrewd men. They were reared in a practical school. If their figuring on a certain bid amounts, for instance, to $410, with the figures at $8 a mile, they put their bid in at $407 or $408, so as to get a little below the even fives or tens. In some way they have been able to discover that the men who live near the routes always put their bids in even fives and tens, so that in that manner, by bidding just a little below their agreed rate, they capture the route. Last year, by this very process of getting a few dollars below the even fives and tens, they succeeded in capturing two-thirds of all the mail-routes let in the United States in the star-route service.

Now understand——

Mr. BELFORD. Let me call your attention to a point just here.

Mr. HORR. I hope my friend from Colorado will not interrupt me now. I want to finish this point.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not be interrupted. I want him to go on with reference to this subject.

Mr. HORR. I am going to do so.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I want to learn something about this matter.

Mr. HORR. You will if you listen. I was going on to say that the people living at home, in the vicinity of the route, bid the amount or just about the amount that they figured out ought to be given for the service; these combinations, as I have shown, learn to go a little below that. They do not intend to do the work, and they bid less than the man who intends to do the work feels as if it should be done for.

There is no collusion at the Department. I supposed myself at first there must have been, but upon examination, when I learned the methods adopted by the Department, I became satisfied that there is no possible chance there for these combinations to learn about the local bids; but these men have reduced their movements almost to a science in the manner that I have stated or in some such manner until they have succeeded in capturing two-thirds of all the star routes in the United States. Then the next thing is to give bonds. They do this and secure the contract. Then they send out their agents to these places, and often sublet to the very man who bid against them; and thus they make men who actually do the work, who carry the mails, take them at from 10 to 30 per cent. less than they themselves bid for them. These contracts, subletting, are on the files of the Department. The result is that the men who carry the mails carry them all over the country for less than the service is actually worth. And these combinations—I am not finding fault with them, it is their business and managed for their own benefit—I say these men manage to make perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars that they do not really earn. That is my objection to the present system. The gentleman says they save money to the Government. Admit it. But it is better for the Government, I say, to pay, if necessary, more money if by doing so we can get a much better service than we can possibly get under the present system. Such would be the result, because we all know that a good service can be had only by paying what it is worth to the men who do the work.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, the gentleman from Michigan says that these combinations in my district, seven or eight hundred miles away from here, make no collusion with the officers in the Department. I wish now to ask the gentleman if he can answer this question, whether the officers in the Department have in times past made no collusions with combinations in the city of Washington? And whether his argument is not in the interest of combinations in Washington instead of the interests of the Government?

Mr. HORR. Not a particle. I would break up these combinations here in Washington just as well as I would in Kentucky, and have the money of the Government go to the men who carry the mails, who do the work. I think that can be done under the provisions of the bill now on our Calendar, which compels them to get the approval of their bonds from postmasters living contiguous to the route. I think that will do it. I should hope it may, because it will give a purer and better service in my judgment and place the money in the pockets of the men who actually earn it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman leaves this point——

Mr. BELFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word to the gentleman——

Mr. HORR. I must decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, as this committee has extended the time of the gentleman from Michigan, as I understand, and as I desired to call his attention to some facts which would confirm his assertion and strengthen the statement he is making, I had hoped to obtain his consent to do so. But he has yielded on two occasions to the gentleman from Kentucky but has declined to extend that courtesy to me. I hope, therefore, that he will be permitted to go on uninterruptedly.

Mr. HORR. I do not know any reply I can make to that. I had no idea of being discourteous to the gentleman from Colorado. He makes no allowance for the fact that so much of my time has been occupied by my friend from Kentucky and by other interruptions.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Michigan, as his time is unlimited and he has made an attack on my district, to yield to me.

Mr. HORR. Not at all. I have made no attack on my friend's district. I am not blaming his constituents. I am simply trying to devise a better system than theirs. But I yield to the gentleman if he will be brief——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I want to state a few facts on the point which the gentleman from Michigan is presenting. I may be presumed to know a little more of my district than the gentleman from Michigan can know. I want to call his attention to this fact, that while there are combinations that bid for star-routes, they understand the business and succeed. I know of one such in my old district which has been in the business for over twenty years. And I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that he may search the records of the Post-Office Department, and he will find that the gentleman to whom I allude, Hon. R. Boyd, of London, Ky., has never been declared a failing contractor for one dollar; nor has he or the combination to which he belongs ever had any service expedited in their interest; nor has any man in my district ever been in connection with any of the star-route frauds. That, sir, is a pretty clean record.

The success of such combinations as that has encouraged other men who do not understand the business to undertake to make money in a business of which they know nothing. Some men will do that in every avocation of life. Some undertake to be merchants who are fit for farming or some other business, but not for the mercantile business. Now I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. HORR. I do not know that I can yield further; the gentleman is ruining my speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Of course I am. I rose for that purpose. I hope the gentleman will not cut me off. Let him give me two minutes more.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman can go on. He seems to need relief for some reason.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I want to refer to an instance which occurred. A gentleman in my district—not in my district now but in loyal Whitley County, which the Democratic party took out of my district because of its loyalty to me—wrote to me asking me to go to the Department to learn why he was reported as a failing contractor; that he had sent a number of bids to the Department and wanted them considered, and that he had been informed by a friend that they were not being considered. I went to Mr. Lyman and asked him why that was so. He said the Sixth Auditor of the Post-Office Department had reported this gentleman as a failing contractor on a route in Alabama. I said: "Did he ask to be restored?" He said "No; if he had asked to be restored we would have restored him" upon the receipt of notice from the Sixth Auditor that his account had been satisfactorily settled.

I looked through the files and saw the gentleman from Whitley had offered to pay up every dollar—$19 I think was the amount—and had asked to be restored. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General had been requested by this gentleman to restore him, as his own files showed, for I saw the papers. This application was nearly a year ago and after he had paid off all his obligations and the Sixth Auditor had certified that his account was settled; and yet his bids had not been considered and never were considered. I showed this to Mr. Lyman, and asked him why it was so. He said he intended to freeze out those bidders in Whitley County, Kentucky. They were troublesome and too remote.

Mr. HORR. I can not yield to the gentleman further, because I am anxious to finish my remarks during my natural life.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I want to show up this case, for it rather indicates that the Department is working in the interest of Washington or other combinations, and is not attempting to do justice to the whole country.

Mr. HORR. I have no assurance that the gentleman's statement would not last a week and must decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of the case named by the gentleman, but I will venture the assertion that the Departments are not working in behalf of Washington combinations as against those in Kentucky or anywhere else. They may be desirous of keeping these star-routes out of the hands of them all; in efforts made in that direction they have my sympathy and support.

I was about coming to another item in the bill, and it is the most important part of the railway mail service, that of the railway clerks, what we used to call the route-agents. Now, we expended in 1883 on this branch of the service $3,888,032. In 1884 we appropriated $3,977,120. The estimate for this year is $4,295,289.60 to perform this work and pay the needed number of clerks.

I need not say to the House that this railway-clerk service is the key to our entire post-office system. The railway clerks distribute the mails from the cars. They do the most laborious work, with the exception of the carriers, of any men in the postal employment. They are hard-working and faithful men. Now, this bill only appropriates $4,000,000 for this service, thus cutting down the estimate $295,289.60. What are the facts in regard to it? For the current year the appropriation, as I have said, was $3,977,120. On the 29th of February last there were employed in this service 4,025 clerks. They cost—for their salary is fixed by law—$4,026,141 per year. This bill carries only $4,000,000. So that if we only give the amount provided in this bill there will be a shortage of $26,141 next year without providing for one particle of increase which necessarily arises in this service.

Does my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] know that all men in the service can not be kept in next year on the appropriation provided in this bill? The service now needs, they tell us, 368 additional clerks, of whom 143 are needed on new lines. Understand me, new railroads that are built to-day need 143 new clerks, and we have not provided a dollar with which to pay them. Can it be possible that the American Congress proposes to make an appropriation for the benefit of the Post-Office Department and leave that service unprovided for, as I have shown?

These new lines must have the service. We all know the man who has the management of this railway service and know there is no more careful man in the employment of the Government. He never uses a dollar above the appropriation, if he lets the service suffer. He never estimates for a shilling that he does not need. We have given him heretofore just the amount he has asked for. He has never exceeded it, and if he has always used it all it is because the good of the service demanded it.

You all know that the mails are piling up on the roads in some parts of the United States because there is a lack of clerks to attend to them. And yet the Committee on Appropriations have here prepared a bill which will actually cripple this service for the next fiscal year. I do not for a moment believe that the House will permit this to be done. Far better give too much than too little for this branch of the service.

Now I come to the little matter of mail bags and catchers. The Committee on Appropriations have reduced the amount estimated by $25,000. What is the fact about that item? The appropriation for that branch of the service has been so low heretofore that the mail-bag supply is running out. Bags for this purpose are only made to order. You can not get a supply of them in a day, or in a week, or in a month. The Post-Office Department has been in the habit of keeping a supply on hand, and the Postmaster-General now tells us that the supply is wellnigh exhausted, and in order to meet the demand and accumulate such a number as prudence dictates $25,000 is needed in excess of the appropriation of last year. I submit to gentlemen here that we ought to grant it.

Again, the estimate for the mail-messenger business is cut down in the same way. You all understand what that is. The mail messenger is the man who carries the mails from the depot to the post-office and from the post-office to the depot, mainly in our large cities. The Department asked for $1,000,000 for the next fiscal year. This branch of the service for the year ending June 30, 1883, cost $800,000. For the year ending June 30, 1884, $850,000 was appropriated. The service will cost for this year $20,000 more than was appropriated for it; that is, the actual amount to be expended for the year 1884 will be $870,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman mean this year or last year?

Mr. HORR. This year.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have not the estimates for this year.

Mr. HORR. I say that from what is now known there will be a deficiency this year of $20,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That must be conjectured for one-half of the year; the fiscal year is only about half gone.

Mr. HORR. This is a service which must be performed. It is not done by the same kind of lettings as the other service is, although it is let in some instances. The postmasters hire this service, and it is performed as cheaply as it can possibly be done. You will find, if you will examine the matter, that the cost of this service cannot be reduced. Yet this bill gives only $900,000 for this service. For the next year there will be required an increased service of this kind of $30,000, if no new roads should be built. But new roads will probably be built, and at least $100,000 more will be required. This service must have a little money for leeway. When the floods came in Cincinnati they telegraphed the Department to give $20 a day extra for messengers, and then again for $25 per day, because they had to carry their mails into the country in order to reach the railroads away from the overflow. This bill reduces the estimate by $100,000, whereas we ought to appropriate every dollar asked in order not to cripple the service.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me state that I have tried to point out some of the reasons why I think this bill ought to be amended. When the proper time comes I shall attempt to have the House so amend it that it will not destroy the service it is intended to support.

I want to say just one word to my friends on the Democratic side of the House. I ask you in all kindness if you think you can gain any political credit or renown by curtailing the service of such a Department as the Post-Office Department of this Government? I permit no man to go before me in an attempt to save to the United States Treasury every dollar unnecessarily expended. But while I would do that, I would be overcareful to give a Department like the Post-Office Department ample money, so that its duties can be performed in a manner that will serve the people as they ought to be served.

Just think of it—trying to run a political party on the simple shibboleth of "economy! economy!" when your economy will hamper and cripple one of the greatest and most perfect systems of the country, that which carries the letters and newspapers of the land. The mail service is sacred in the eyes of the people. It conveys knowledge, information, messages of love from homes to homes all over the United States. Now what we should do is, like business men, to appropriate sufficient for this service, as nearly as we can, to provide for its needs; not gingerly, not reluctantly. The postage collected pays the bills. Let us do for the Post-Office Department what we as individuals would do for it if we owned it and were running it ourselves. Let us give them the necessary funds to make the service complete and efficient. They are not squandering the money. No country in the world has a purer service. And to do that you will be compelled to amend this bill in the many features which I have pointed out. I am satisfied that the majority of this House are not going to cripple the mail service of this country. When once its needs are understood you will surely treat this service with a liberality and fairness that is commensurate with its importance.

I am much obliged to the committee for the kind attention given me, though I have been compelled, owing to interruptions, to take much more time than I had intended.

Mr. SUMNER, of California. Mr. Chairman, I shall contend that every Representative when he stands before the Speaker's desk and takes the prescribed oath to support the Constitution of the United States gives solemn promise and pledge to aid, according to his opportunity and ability, toward securing an enlargement of the present postal system of the United States by the establishment of a Government postal telegraph. I know that to some—perhaps to many—this proposition may at first seem unfounded and absurd. I know that at least all the decent epithets that can be heaped upon a man to characterize him as lacking the faculties which go to make up the average human intellect, which are requisite for the possession of good common-sense, have been applied to those persons who have insisted that upon grounds of public policy the United States of America should have and should operate a Government postal telegraph. Much more might it be expected that such a claim for fundamental basis, obligation, and demand as I have ventured to present, if there be condescension to notice it at all, will be challenged or scouted as belonging alone in the domain of the ridiculous. Yet it is presented here and now as my title and my text.

The Constitution of the United States, in section 8 of article 1, provides that Congress may establish post-offices and post-roads—the precise language being that "The Congress shall have power to establish post-offices and post-roads." More than a century of uninterrupted and unchallenged legislation founded upon that provision of the organic act has so construed this delegation of authority as to make it an instruction and mandate to the members of the National Legislature. We have then only to ascertain the function of the Post-Office, which was established under the Articles of Confederation, and the nature of the added "power," to "establish post-roads," in order to see how far a performance of duty under oath is by this subdivision required of every one of us.

It is interesting to trace the history of the public post, and note its recorded existence as marking the advance and the climax of civilizations in the Old World. But while such a review would be pertinent and appropriate at the beginning of a train of rising argument on such an occasion, I have not the time here to enter upon it. We may have gratefully regarded the institution in its general, comprehensive, and beneficent provisions, as it was in the day of its adoption by us a nearly perfect legacy from our immediate forefathers—from those countries to which we shall have occasion to refer hereafter when we come to urge with specific detail that increase in the postal facilities of the people which belongs to our due obedience to the supreme statute of our Union. Under the privilege usually accorded, however, I shall wish to have read at this point in my published remarks an extract from the standard treatise on the Constitution, written by Joseph Story, respecting the advantages enjoyed, and to be constantly increased, by authority of the clause "to establish post-offices and post-roads." No less a man than Judge Story, when writing on this subject more than forty years ago (1839), saw fit to say:

This power is peculiarly appropriate to the National Government, and would be at once unwieldy, dilatory, and irregular in the hands of the States, from the utter impracticability of adopting any uniform system of regulations for the whole continent, and from the inequality of the burdens and benefits of any local system among the several States in proportion to their own expenditure. Under the auspices of the Government the Post-Office has already become one of the most beneficent and useful of our national establishments. It circulates intelligence of a commercial, political, literary, and private nature with incredible speed and regularity. It thus administers, in a very high degree, to the comfort, the interests, and the necessities of persons in every rank and station of life. It is not less effective as an instrument of the Government, enabling it in times of peace and war to send its orders, execute its measures, transmit its funds, and regulate its operations with a promptitude and certainty which are of incalculable importance in point of economy as well as of energy. The rapidity of its movements has been in a general view doubled within the last twenty years; and there were at the close of 1838 12,663 post-offices in the United States, with mails then traveling in various directions and on various routes more than 134,000 miles. The net amount of postage in 1838 amounted to a little short of three millions of dollars.

It seems wholly unnecessary to vindicate the grant of a power which has been thus demonstrated to be of the highest value to all the people of the Union.

I think it will be observed at once that there is a very great significance in some portions of this short chapter from Judge Story's famous hand-book of the Constitution, as bearing upon the topic announced.

Mr. Chairman, is there any gentleman here who will rise and seriously suggest, by way of amendment or otherwise, that we should refrain from making any postal appropriation at all during this session of Congress? Or declare that we should make provision for transferring, so soon as conveniently may be, the administration of postal affairs to private management? Imagine, if you can, a Representative on this floor insisting that our mail-bags should be taken from the railway vans and placed upon mail-coaches of the pattern of fifty or sixty years ago, to be drawn by animals from place to place? What one of us would tolerate, in a moment's sober thought, such a proposition as that? Who could put forward such a suggestion with the air of sustained sincerity without its being suspected by all reasonable and reasoning listeners that the man was a fit subject for an imbecile's asylum? And yet I confess that it has seemed to me that having regard exclusively to the letter-carrying for the people, it is almost as absurd to insist that the Government of the United States ought not, on the grounds of authority and propriety, either or both, to undertake the transmission of intelligence by the operations of the telegraph. In the "progress of events" the post-boy succeeded the military courier and the wandering merchant as a carrier of the people's letters; and the mail-coach and the railway car in due order succeeded them. In the "progress of events" the telegraph should have been brought, as elsewhere it has been, under national administration, and so utilized and regulated as a method of intercommunication between the inhabitants of our country. I seek to put the matter upon its true and firm basis, and in the simplicity of history and of right.

I noticed that the reporting member of the Appropriations Committee having this bill in charge, and to whose great courtesy I am indebted for the personal privilege of this hour, in his own apt and becoming summary of the "progress of events" in connection with the postal system of Europe, incidentally referred to the fact that in a great degree the electric current, brought in subjection to the will of man, bears the messages of the people of Great Britain from shore to shore. As he spoke I felt the waiting of expectation for a suggestion from his lips that would have embraced a recommendation for the reform or implied favor for the enlargement that I stand here to advocate. There was in what he said at least the inadvertent directing of attention to the deplorable contrast between the postal facilities enjoyed by the peoples of other enlightened countries and those vouchsafed to our own.

Mr. Chairman, in order to outline at once the entire advocacy that I would like to make before this Legislature—although I can now do no more than touch and go with respect to some points involved in the brief opportunity that is here afforded—I will suggest an amendment that, if the rules permitted, I should offer by way of addition to the bill reported. I would seek to have annexed, with an appropriate change of the numbering of the sections, House bill No. 98, introduced by me on the 10th day of December, 1883:

A bill to enlarge the postal facilities of the people of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to provide the people of the United States with such facilities for the transmission of letters, in addition to those now had by due course of mail, as are possessed and enjoyed by every other civilized nation, it is hereby determined and declared that the postal system of the United States shall include and embrace a postal telegraph; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized, empowered, and instructed to proceed at once to prescribe or cause to be prepared plans and specifications for the construction of the lines of said postal telegraph; and actual work in the building of such lines shall be begun at as early a date as practicable; and the work of construction and extension of such lines shall be prosecuted until all the post-offices of the country south of the northernmost boundary of Washington Territory, having a population of four hundred inhabitants or more, shall have been connected by such a number of postal-telegraph wires as will meet the requirements of the people for business and personal correspondence. Contracts shall be let, after due advertisement, for the work of construction and for the furnishing of materials, instruments, and office appointments, to the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the better to carry out the purposes of this act the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General is hereby created; and such officer, who shall be a competent and skillful electrician, shall be appointed in the same manner in which the other Assistant Postmasters-General are appointed, and with the same salary. The duties of such officer shall be, under the direction and subject to the supervision of the Postmaster-General, to exercise a general power of management and control over the administration of the telegraph, and to make an annual report thereupon to the Postmaster-General, which report shall show the amount of the receipts and expenditures of his office, the number of Government and other dispatches transmitted during the year preceding the date of such report, the number of miles of new lines constructed, the number of new offices opened, together with such information as may be specially required from him by the Postmaster-General of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the construction of the telegraph lines contemplated under the provisions of this act shall be begun, as near as practicable, simultaneously at the following places, namely: Portland, in the State of Maine; Seattle, in Washington Territory; Boston, in the State of Massachusetts; Portland, in the State of Oregon; New York, in the State of New York; Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania; Baltimore, in the State of Maryland; Washington, in the District of Columbia; Richmond, in the State of Virginia; New Berne, in the State of North Carolina; Charleston, in the State of South Carolina; Savannah, in the State of Georgia; Jacksonville, in the State of Florida; Mobile, in the State of Alabama; New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana; Galveston, in the State of Texas; Cincinnati and Cleveland, in the State of Ohio; Detroit, in the State of Michigan; Chicago, in the State of Illinois; Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota; Omaha, in the State of Nebraska; Saint Louis and Kansas City, in the State of Missouri; Denver, in the State of Colorado; Salt Lake City, in Utah Territory; Yreka, Eureka, Sacramento, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego, in the State of California; and the work of construction shall continue with all reasonable dispatch along the routes selected by the Postmaster-General until every town in the United States of four hundred inhabitants or more, situated south of the northernmost boundary of Washington Territory, shall have been reached and connected by the telegraphic wires of the postal telegraph radiating from the principal points hereinbefore designated. But nothing in this section or act shall be construed so as to prohibit or restrain the Postmaster-General from establishing and maintaining postal-telegraph stations at any other post-offices than are herein embraced by the designation of a minimum population; the object and intent of this act being to establish and maintain a postal telegraph that shall ultimately, and as spedily as practicable, reach with its wires and its operating facilities every post-office in the United States; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized, empowered, and instructed to establish and open for business such postal-telegraph stations as he may, in his discretion, deem it wise or expedient to establish, and open for business, along the routes prescribed by him in sparsely settled portions of this nation, such stations as are, in his judgment, necessary or desirable for the proper maintenance of the through line or lines of the postal telegraph, or as are, in his judgment, required for the convenience of the people of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the wires, cables, insulators, poles, troughs, instruments, and batteries of the postal telegraph of the United States shall be of the very best material procurable, adapted in every respect, so far as reasonably may be, for the highest efficiency and the most rapid performance of the work that will be required to be done by their agency.

SEC. 5. That the local offices of the postal telegraph shall be established in the respective post-offices of the United States, in the cities and towns and villages on the routes designated, and the local management shall be under the supervision and direction of the postmaster in each city, town, or village so connected on the postal-telegraph routes as aforesaid. The compensation of the operators and messengers shall be paid from the receipts of the respective offices for postal-telegraph services: Provided, That during the first five years from and after the passage and approval of this act the Postmaster-General may meet and supply any deficiency in the receipts of any postal-telegraph office, as compared with the revenue derived from the dispatch of telegraphic messages or the sale of postal-telegraph stamps, by payments out of the fund arising from the sale of postal-telegraph bonds as hereinafter provided for; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall honor the drafts of the Postmaster-General in accordance with this section.

SEC. 6. That the rates for the transmission of messages shall be ten cents for each ten words or less, exclusive of the address and signature, and five cents for each additional ten words or less. The Postmaster-General shall arrange and provide for the transmission of messages from news associations and news agents to the newspapers of the country at a rate not exceeding twenty cents for one hundred words. The Postmaster-General shall provide and publish rules and regulations to secure entire impartiality in the transmission of the press dispatches. But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prohibit or restrain the Postmaster-General from reducing at any time the rates for transmission of dispatches between any points on any of the routes or lines of the postal telegraph.

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, cause to be issued postal-telegraph stamps, of convenient denominations, which may be distributed for sale in the same way as are the existing postage-stamps. If such stamps shall be issued, no written telegraphic message or letter, except it pertain to the business of lines of the postal telegraph, shall be transmitted without such stamp or stamps affixed thereto, except as hereinafter provided; but such messages as would properly be inclosed and forwarded in a penalty envelope, by mail, may be sent free over the lines of the postal telegraph at all times, under such limitations as may be prescribed by the Postmaster-General. But nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit or restrain the Postmaster-General from directing, in his discretion, that the postal stamps now existing shall be used and canceled upon such telegram blanks as may be provided by him, or as may be sent forth under his direction to the postal-telegraph offices of the people of the United States. And the Postmaster-General shall cause to be issued blanks for telegraph messages, having word-spaces ruled thereon, with appropriate headings, and with such information and instructions printed on the face or on the back of said blanks as the Postmaster-General may direct; and the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, cause to be issued blanks bearing an engraved stamp of an appropriate character, and of such denominations as he may select and determine. Blanks upon which foreign messages shall be sent may be prescribed and issued by the order of the Postmaster-General, so soon as he shall have made arrangements for the transmission of telegrams from terminal offices of the postal-telegraph department of the postal system to points beyond the jurisdiction of the United States of America, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster-General shall cause to be issued postal-telegraph cards, of the denomination of 10 cents and 15 cents and 20 cents, on one side of which word-spaces shall be ruled for the writing of postal-telegraph messages. Such postal-telegraph cards may be deposited in any letter post-box at a post-office where there is a postal-telegraph connection, or in any letter post-box which is or may be fixed on a letter-carrier route. If the number of words written on a postal-telegraph card so deposited as above does not exceed the limit prescribed by this act, these words, composing a message, shall be dispatched by the postal telegraph; all messages so received being sent in the order in which they reach the hands of the postmaster or his assistants; and the Postmaster-General may prescribe and publish rules and regulations for the transmission of messages, of the kind and character herein set forth, in penalty envelopes, to and from post-offices in the United States where postal-telegraph connection has been established and maintained.

SEC. 9. That the money-order system existing and now in operation in the Post-Office Department shall, as soon as practicable, be adapted to the postal telegraph; and the charge for transmitting money-orders by the postal telegraph within the United States, wherever money-order offices are now or may be hereafter established, shall be the rates charged upon money-orders transmitted by mail, in addition to the regular charge for postal telegrams; but no postal-telegraph money-order shall exceed $50.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and instructed to issue bonds of the United States, in amounts not exceeding $50 each, and not exceeding in the aggregate value $25,000,000, redeemable in lawful money of the United States within twenty years, and payable within thirty years from the day of issue, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable in lawful money of the United States, at the subtreasury in the city of New York, or in the city of Chicago, or in the city of San Francisco, on the 1st day of January and on the 1st day of July of each year. Each bond shall be sold separately, and shall bear interest from the 1st day of January or the 1st day of July next ensuing after the day of sale. Each postmaster in the United States is hereby authorized to act as an agent for the sale of such bonds; and the Postmaster-General shall cause to be issued a circular setting forth this fact of authority, and containing such directions in the premises as to him may seem best calculated to promote the sale of said bonds to the people of the United States, for and in behalf of the construction and establishment of the postal telegraph, in enlargement of the postal system of the United States. The proceeds of said sale or sales shall be devoted to the construction and maintenance of the postal telegraph of the United States, including payment for wires, cables, poles, troughs, insulators, batteries, operating instruments, and all office appointments, and the right of way, and any operating expenses not met by the receipts for the sending of messages or the sale of postal-telegraph stamps and the sale of stamped postal-telegraph cards or stamped blanks, during the first five years from and after the date of the passage and approval of this act; and the Post-Office Department shall keep a separate account of all sales and receipts and of all expenditures connected with the construction, establishment, and maintenance of the postal telegraph of the people of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall honor all drafts of the Postmaster-General in accordance with the provisions of this section.

SEC. 11. That the right of way is hereby granted for the construction of the lines of the postal telegraph over all the public lands of the United States; and there is hereby dedicated and granted for the use of the Government employés in the Postal Department of the United States so much of the public lands as may be needed for station building or workshops along the lines of said postal telegraph; and along and adjacent to said lines, on the public lands, it shall be lawful for the persons actually engaged in building such lines to cut poles and timber necessary for the work of construction, including timber for the building of houses on the public lands that may be required for stations or workshops at points distant from the thickly inhabited sections of the country; and the Secretary of the Interior shall recognize and respect this authority and license within fifty miles of the routes for the postal telegraph, on either side of the routes or way selected on the public lands for the construction of the postal telegraph.

SEC. 12. That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, construct an underground line of insulated wires or cables where and when in his judgment such underground line will be preferable to a line constructed by wires or cables stretched upon poles.

SEC. 13. That the telegraph lines of the postal telegraph shall be constructed along or across or under any street, road, canal, railroad, or other public highway that the Postmaster-General may designate; and no one shall be allowed damages or rental for the right of way on said lines except the same shall not be upon a public highway.

SEC. 14. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and empowered to open for business, at the rates hereinbefore designated, or at less rates for transmission, any section of fifty miles of telegraph wire or wires completed in pursuance of the provisions of this act; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and empowered to accept, as a part of the postal telegraph of the people of the United States, any section of fifty miles or more along the line of the routes designated by him, constructed subsequent to the passage and approval of this act: Provided, That the material used in said construction, and the character of the work performed in the building and maintenance of such section, shall be in conformity to the terms prescribed in section 4 of this act: And provided further, That the amount asked and paid for a perfect and complete title to such section of telegraph construction shall not exceed the lowest price at which the Postmaster-General could procure materials and construction of a precisely similar or equally excellent section of telegraph line on this prescribed route of the postal telegraph.

SEC. 15. That the Postmaster-General shall, so soon as desirable and practicable, enter into negotiations and arrangements with the proprietors of telegraph lines or telegraph cables which extend from the United States into foreign countries, by which telegraphic messages may be forwarded between persons residing in the United States or sojourning therein and persons residing or sojourning in foreign countries, over the lines of the postal telegraph of this Government to and from the borders of the United States of America.

SEC. 16. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized, as soon as he may deem it expedient, to seek to ascertain the best route for a line of telegraph wires or cables between some point in Washington Territory and the town or port of Sitka, in Alaska; and for this purpose he shall, through the Department of State or otherwise, inquire as to the terms and conditions upon which a telegraph line of wires or cables can be constructed through British Columbia and over or under waters within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, from the border of this nation in Washington Territory to the border of this nation in Alaska; and the Postmaster-General shall report the results of this inquiry in his next annual report to the President of the United States.

SEC. 17. That all persons shall have the right to correspond by telegraph in the manner herein prescribed. Telegrams shall be privileged communications in law to the extent that private letters now are. They may be written in secret letters or cipher, and shall be transmitted in the order in which they are received at the several offices. All provisions of law relating to the secretion or destruction, or to the receipt, transmission, and delivery of mailed letters, and to the sale of stamps and stamped paper, and their improper use, shall, so far as pertinent, apply to telegrams and telegraphic stamps. Every postmaster shall be accountable for all stamps and stamped paper furnished to him. Any person connected with the post-office who shall willfully remove from any telegram any stamp affixed thereon, or who shall, contrary to his duty, disclose or in any way make known or intercept the contents of any telegram, or any part thereof, or who shall delay or hinder the transmission or delivery thereof, and any person who shall willfully or maliciously obstruct or postpone the transmission or delivery or divulge the contents of any telegram, or any part thereof, or who shall injure or destroy any of the property of the postal telegraph department of the postal system of the United States, or interfere with the working, repairs, or use of any line of the postal telegraph, shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States for the district where such offense shall have been committed, or where such person shall reside, be subject to a fine not exceeding $200, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. It shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to cause to be prosecuted all persons offending against any provisions of this section.

There is no time for a very extended recital of statistics, and you would have no indulgence for a reading at this hour from tables which argumentatively and conclusively refer to the details of electric telegraph operation, to the comparisons of cost, and to the warranting of expenditures. And besides, what I can be allowed in reason and propriety to present of this nature, I must defer to the latter part of my remarks, assuming that I shall have the privilege of appending to my speech any series or sums referred to, when the reporter's manuscript goes from the official note-taker's hands.

There is a necessary or much-needed labor of speech-prefatory before we can enter into specifications as to the peculiar demands (for such I shall contend do exist in this country) in behalf of a postal telegraph; much more are these introductory or clearing passages required prior to any statement and consideration of items of cost and expenditure.

We are confronted at the very threshold by an assertion—I had almost said by a proclamation—intended, you may be sure, more especially for this side of the House, which, it now happens, is in a majority; an assertion that the postal telegraph, as an enlargement of the present postal system of the United States, would be in violation of the strict-construction doctrines of Thomas Jefferson (oh, most abused of noble names)! With some this whole subject has been peremptorily and instantly rejected or put out of mind, denied any consideration, with the shouted challenge, "It signifies paternal government!" Mr. Chairman, if this is "paternal government," the establishment of the postal system that resulted in strapping the mail-bags on the post-boy's pony, that afterward transferred them into the boot of the mail-coach, that finally tossed them into the van of the railway, is "paternal government." And the logical and moral outcome of any proper reasoning on such a theory or basis ought to be the presentation and persistent urging here of a plan for the speedy abandonment of all governmental administration devoted to or connected with the transmission of intelligence. Is the authority for the challenge at hand? If not, may I ask for it? Can it be brought from the writings of Thomas Jefferson? They are convenient for reference. There, close at hand, is the great Library. The topic was in his mouth for public and private communications. Occasional, general expressions can not be interpreted against explicit language of favor. Present one single extract from one State paper or one private epistle in which he questioned the policy of a postal system in the United States or regretted the establishment of that branch of public service. I respectfully defy any man to do that. On the contrary, had I the time I could read to you from his authenticated volumes, wherein he commended that portion of the Constitution which has just been repeated, congratulating his fellow-citizens upon its adoption, and urging a thankful consideration of its manifold merits. And so with our other political fathers. If you oppose this measure, deny that they were right in their views; do not affect to quote them.

But it is "paternal government," after and in spite of everything said by anybody; and the changes are rung upon this phrase without pause or qualification, as if indeed it were an absolute barrier to a single step in the direction that has been indicated. Movement in this direction "unconstitutional!" I declare the true adjuration is so reversed. Against the unwritten letter or in violation of the spirit of our traditional policy? It is in keeping with them both.

Call this by what name you will. Against the pitiful sneering and the contemptuous adjectives which are indulged in by the attorneys for the great telegraph monopoly—after they have filled their mouths full of the popularized phrase—I put the august letter of the organic law. It is written in the Constitution, Congress shall have the power. It is written in history, Congress has uninterruptedly exercised the power. And I make bold to add, and call to discussion thereon, with all due respect for the members of this National Council past and present, and conscious of assuming nothing extraordinary or conceited in the summons: that the Congress of the United States has neglected to perform its constitutionally bound duty when it failed from year to year, from 1844, to inaugurate and institute a system of Government postal telegraph, in enlargement of the existing postal facilities of the people of the United States. If it is "paternal government," you have neither Thomas Jefferson nor any other father of the Republic at your beck for attendance by testament of opinion in this tribunal, in support of the opposition made to the passage of such a bill as I have had the honor to submit to this Forty-eighth Congress of the Union. During the Presidential terms of Jefferson and Madison, surveys, appropriations, and work of construction for national post-roads are recorded.

Bring to your minds again the language of Mr. Justice Story:

> This power is peculiarly appropriate to the National Government. * * * It seems wholly unnecessary to vindicate the grant of a power which has been thus demonstrated to be of the highest value to all the people of the Union.

Even such a philosopher as Herbert Spencer, extreme in his views of confining the functions of government close to the border of police duty, is compelled to say:

> Respecting the carrying of letters it may here be repeated that it is not intrinsically at variance with state duty; for it does not in the abstract necessitate any infringement of man's right, either direct or by taxes raised for non-protective purposes.

And he can only oppose the postal system on the same ground from which he objects to coinage of the money of the realm.

But I deny utterly that a postal telegraph comes under the heading of "paternal government" in the objectionable or odious sense of these words. I do not maintain or believe in the doctrine of a paternal government within the lines mapped by our political ancestors of Democratic faith—no more, I dare be tested, than the most ultra strict constructionist upon this side of the Chamber. Those who oppose us with respect to this project sometimes make unjustifiable assumptions in debate or in the tussels of conversation. I do not believe in that "paternal government" which would enter aggressively into the domain of private enterprise—as it was claimed here, a few days ago, the government of the Italian nation once had done—to the destruction of private business and the financial ruin of the country. Certainly no one engaged in this advocacy believes in anything like standing up any class of citizens against lamp-posts or street-walls and stuffing them as you would stuff a turkey for Christmas. Yet it doth appear, at times, that even to this extreme and ludicrous disposition and doctrine would the desperate defenders of the greatest monopoly in this country seek to put every man who espouses our side of this great issue. In no light can this proposition for a postal telegraph be stamped as a matter of "paternal government," unless by that term you choose to characterize it as a plan of legislation in conformity to the express counsel and plan and example of the fathers of the Republic; which would be changing the entire significance of the adjoining words as they have been commonly accepted, and as they are intended to be understood and to be effective in the discussion of this subject. Some men get in a rut of name-calling, phrase-flinging, and precedent-quoting; instructed in a school of error and built up as with the adamant of unjust and unreasoning prejudice. And so it has come to pass that we find hope in the breast of the monopolies of this land, when the Democratic party triumphs—when it triumphs under and on account of loud and seemingly unmistakable assurances of anti-monopoly action and reform; although that party professes to be, and although we claim that in early and recent years of the Republic that political organization in fact has proved itself to be, the best political brotherhood; representing with clearest and closest fidelity the will of the people, and seeking at all times the greatest good to the whole. Unjust and chronic antipathies prevent due and candid reflections and action upon propositions that are in the interest of the Democracy; which we must favorably act upon or deny or transgress our party commandments. There should be emulation here to illustrate which political organization best deserves the name of the party of the people.

What is a postal telegraph? It is a more rapid method of carrying the letters of the people; in itself nothing more or less. What will you do with a telegraph line except you send upon it the letters or transmit the communications of the people from place to place? Its analogy is rather to the mail-bags than to the mail-car. Its devotion is exclusively to the service of letter conveyance. Wonderful indeed that it should not first have borne upon its threads for the uses of mankind the current of physical light; singular is the record in this order of invention. But light alone it bears, to the eye or to the mind. And here comes the distinction. Here is appropriate division, marking a boundary for our argument at once, between the carrying of communications, which the Constitution says shall be the function of the General Government, and the transmission of the burning force for the incandescent lamp. The one is public service under the Constitution, enjoined by the first article; the other is private enterprise for ministering to the purely physical wants or luxuries of man.

But one who comes in a reasoning and candid mood to the consideration of this subject may say: "There is a wide difference between the carrying of the mail-bags in a railway van and the transmission of intelligence by electricity; and it may be that while the mail-route service as it exists on the rail-track to-day is not strictly 'paternal,' the postal-telegraph system would be." Why? Is it with respect to method or is it with respect to celerity?

Our fathers constantly speak of the mail as a means of conveying or transmitting intelligence. Just as soon as a general postal system was established an aim in the administration was speed of intercommunication. So boasted the venerable and venerated Story. I think the hesitation of the inquirer in these premises is often due to the fact of the tremendous leap that was made from the express-train carriage to the instantaneous dispatch of the electric current. Let us see.

Now, it was doubtless unfortunate that wisdom did not dwell in our Cabinet council sufficient to hold the power and prerogative that was at first and in later years offered to or urged upon its members.

And here let me remark—that which can scarcely be called a digression—that the author and the first champion of a Government postal-telegraph system in this country has often been wrongfully and is today perhaps popularly misnamed. What is the center of every city, town, and village in the land; the social and political center? Is it the church? No. For every village of five or six hundred inhabitants in this religious and God-fearing age and Republic will surely have two or more meeting-houses. Is it the school-house? No. For division is there, not only by districts but often by separately-graded academies. I speak of the one central hearthstone of the people. It is not even the town-house, where gatherings are occasional and usually formal—though this might with some propriety come under the definition; but the place of common resort, the point toward which all intelligent minds in the community have special reference and expectation day by day? It is the post-office. Into it and out of it go the issues of the brain and the heart of the people almost hour by hour. The tidings of business are sent and taken there. We make choicest ministrations through it; the light of literature and of love, the messages of consolation and of cheer, constantly radiate from it. It takes and transmits the diary of our lives, and will have and deliver the time and manner of our deaths. In its administration it has power from the people, whose place for the great direction and control is at the capital of the country. And here came the author, the originator of the postal telegraph, Professor S. F. B. Morse himself. Set aside for a moment that consideration for the progress of events which inevitably suggested to uncounted thousands the propriety of the establishment contended for, the very instant that the invention of practical telegraphy was made known—set aside that, and you have in the distinguished American I have named the man out of whose mouth the sufficient testimony is borne as to the propriety of enlarging the postal facilities of this country by the establishment of a postal telegraph.

It may be said that he merely came to Congress for an appropriation. But it is well known and is a matter of record that he came here with the full expectation and the natural belief that the Legislature of the Union would ultimately and speedily instruct the Postmaster-General to proceed in accordance with such provisions as are placed in bill No. 98, or sections of similar sentences. His distinguished biographer, Dr. Prime, writes that "it was a favorite idea with Professor Morse from the inception of his enterprise that the telegraph should belong to the General Government."

But it was a leap from the railroad to the telegraph line. It was jumping from forty or fifty miles an hour, at the uttermost, to the quickness of a pulse-throb, and the comparison, the contrast, is startling. And some seem to have a galvanic shock when they are reminded of it, so that they are literally thrown out of mental gear; and whereas they had said that it was a constitutional duty under our oath to appropriate money as this bill reported from the Appropriation Committee provides, yet it would be "paternal government," and therefore improper, to establish a postal telegraph.

May it not be possible to contribute to the removal of this delusion by imagining an advance in the speed of carrying letters which would serve to partly bridge this great space that exists between the achievements of Stephenson and of Morse?

And by the way—and here is a digression, sure enough—I hope I shall be pardoned for calling your attention to what has always seemed to me a providential circumstance: the discovery and invention culminating in practical telegraphy in three or four different nations nearly at the same point of time. Sixty-two men had touched the secret, and some of them had almost perfected a working model when our great professor proclaimed his success. Was it not divinely foreordained that the whole world should not be held in thraldom by a telegraph monopoly, and that we to-day should have examples everywhere else among the governments of enlightened peoples to which we can point at once for argument and for demonstration. Thank God for this record, and the consummations that are in it and attached to it.

Come we back to reasonable and persuasive imaginings. Suppose there had been invented and placed at least upon the great trunk routes, between some points superseding the track of the existing railway, an arm-pit rail-chair construction, along which with almost absolute safety the engine rushed from capital to capital at the rate of a hundred miles an hour. With such a highway established between Washington and New York and Chicago and Saint Louis and New Orleans, would there be any hesitation about placing in a baggage-car of the new and speedier line the mail-bags that had heretofore been sent over the rails that were laid on the level of the earth? What Representative, who among the distinguished lawyers in the service of the great telegraph monopoly, for instance, would have ventured in the interest of his client to protest that the transfer should not be made because—among other reasons—because, as a comprehensive and sufficient reason, the change would be an act subjecting its authors to indictment under an unwritten penal code long since orally headed "paternal government?" Come, now! Who would have objected for any reason known to the calendar? And if such objection had been made, would we not now say, supposing this construction to have been an accomplishment of the past, that the objector was well-deserving of a dismissal or an arrest on the accusation of lunacy?

"Well, but this is a little step—from forty or fifty or sixty miles an hour to one hundred miles an hour. And the carriage, too, is all of the same pattern; newspapers and letters go together the same as before, in bulk."

It is only an imagining, and yet it is in some respects within the wonder-line of the achievement that was made—less marvelous as a prophecy of fifty or sixty years ago than the electric telegraph—it is but a matter of imagination, and yet I respectfully insist it is justified and justifying, when I go on to suppose that the difficulties in the way of the problem of aerial navigation had been overcome: up mounts the flying chariot from the street in front of the Patent Office at Washington, and turns its prow to the west. Imagine if you can that in two hours it is hailed over Chicago, in another hour seen at Omaha, in a few hours more signaled at Salt Lake City, finding a resting-place before the set of sun in the city of San Francisco. Suppose the journey is repeated back and forth, over and over again, at the wonderful speed of three hundred miles an hour—repeated until there is no one left to doubt the final and perfect success of the invention. And then, as the inventor and his company of friends are about to depart on a transcontinental trip for the tenth or fifteenth time, about to rise before us in their car from the grounds in the rear of this Capitol, the suggestion is made that some of the mail-bags be taken from the railway van and tossed into this darting-bird of man's construction. And lo! there is heard a voice crying not in the wilderness but in a center of civilization and in a center of national legislation: "You must not do that at the expense of this Government, for it would be paternal government, and in violation of Jeffersonian Democratic principles!"

Then suppose that the inventive genius of a Yankee nation, as represented in some cute applicant at the door of the Patent Office, produced a pneumatic tube with an apparatus capable of forcing or shooting a hollow ball or cone along the air-exhausted circle at the rate of five hundred miles an hour, at a five-hundred-mile range. Suppose that this invention had an unquestioned practical success, development, and demonstration:—what then? In the arm-pit rail-car the living passenger may go. Perhaps in the close missile of the tube it would not be convenient or safe for a human being to travel. That would be the only distinction that could possibly, momentarily, be considered relevant in this inquiry. But it will not be contended that human attendance is necessary. I am supposing, of course, that the invention is perfected to the extent or capacity to carry at the rate of speed indicated between the points which I have once before mapped out. Would any one cry "paternal government" against putting the mail-bags into the shell thus shot through this pneumatic tube at the rate of five hundred miles an hour? Would not the Government have built a set of these tubes of its own? Would there be any invoking of the shades of Thomas Jefferson as against that proposition?

Then, and not until then, let us imagine that the electric telegraph is born. The leap would still be great, it must be granted; the distance spanned by the achievement immense. But the comparative advantages would be vastly diminished—with a mail hence to San Francisco in six hours, and no one questioning the propriety of the proclamation of mail-bag transfer. Would there be objection then, of any kind, to the Government use of the telegraph for an advantage, delivery considered, of perhaps not more than four or five hours? Having gone so far in dispatch of letters, would the Government have stopped at the pneumatic cannon's mouth?

Yet because of the leap, that is, from the present express train to the telegraph, there does actually exist the more real reason for the Government action now demanded.

The argument is sufficient when we have gone from the post-boy to the express train, so far as that character of argument is required. But if invention had followed upon invention in some such procession as outlined, would we have had to meet this door-sill objection, now so ready in the mouths of the monopoly lobbyists? Would we have had this call on our Government to halt—a call made at this time, it so happens, largely in the interest of a great and tyrannical monopoly? Would it have been tolerated or thought of for a moment?

"Ah, but," one says, "here is the difference: In the rail-car, in the flying chariot, in the pneumatic tube, you would put all our mail, letters and newspapers, in bulk. By the telegraph you can only transmit intelligence. The identical paper on which you write your letter can not go by telegraph. Our newspaper publications can not travel on that line." I grant you. I am glad you yourself have said it. I do not wish to miss or avoid or evade anything. I am not so sure but that invention already has nearly reached to that point where the whole face of the letter or the daily printed paper may not be photographed. It is within the promise. It is claimed as within the near future of development and demonstration. Morse's working model had to remain in the exhibition department for a time, awaiting the construction of new batteries by Daniell and Grove, before his triumph was complete. It is said that but little is lacking of the tremendous accomplishment which I have indicated. See Caselli's pantelegraph, devised and put into practical use nearly twenty years ago. By it manuscript and maps and charts and simple drawings of every sort are copied with unerring accuracy.

Suppose again, that instead of taking the substance of the letter and passing it through the brain of the manipulator at one end of the wire, and the brain of the manipulator as he reads or listens at the other end of the wire, and thence by the fingers of the latter to new paper, the telegraphic wire was actually the hollow tube that many unsophisticated people imagined it was, in early days, through which with lightning rapidity the literal letter ran. That idea was less incredible to the uneducated than the method and achievement that really was. Who would cry "paternal government" then? The argument from this is, that the nicety of distinction is all upon the other side; and that practically it is too attenuated to be worthy of such entertaining as would give pause to the establishment for which we plead.

It should be constantly borne in mind that our fathers in outlining this Government dealt with the transmission of intelligence—talked about it, wrote about it in connection with the post-office and post-road establishment. To bind the people together by the rapid conveyance or transmission of intelligence—that was the phrase from old Ben Franklin down to Cave Johnson. The Continental Congress, May 25, 1775, resolved that "ways and means should be devised for the speedy and secure conveyance of intelligence from one end of the continent to the other," and that "Mr. Franklin consider the best means of establishing posts for conveying letters and intelligence through the continent." The delivery of thought from mind to mind—from merchant to merchant, from friend to friend—this it was that was to be provided for by the seventh paragraph of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States. Not a mere parcel delivery, as some of the monopoly lawyers would have you believe; to which, by the way, the telegraph, if unappropriated or unutilized in a Government postal telegraph, will during the next century reduce our national mail system.

Alas! for the mistake that was made after Professor Morse had set down his instruments and his battery in the committee-room of the House Committee on Commerce and demonstrated their excellence. And after he had memorialized Congress in this language: "The electro-magnetic telegraph is an engine of power, for good or for evil, which all opinions seem to concur in desiring to have subject to the control of the Government, rather than have it in the hands of private individuals and associations." In what an incalculable degree have the people been deprived of the benefits which they should already have derived from the fruits of the inventive genius of the age and the country! Go through all departments of life and seek to take an approximate measure of our loss. We all must mourn it, if we will but read the undisputed and indisputable history of the last thirty-five or forty years, with reference to telegraphic communication in this country.

When the subject was considered in the House of Representatives, the title of the bill being "A bill to test the practicability of establishing a system [mark the word] of electro-magnetic telegraphs by the United States," there was "merriment." The bill appropriated $30,000. It is recorded in the Congressional Globe that—

Mr. Cave Johnson wished to have a word to say upon the bill. As the present had done much to encourage science he did not wish to see the science of mesmerism neglected and overlooked. He proposed that one-half of the appropriation be given to Mr. Fisk, to enable him to carry on experiments, as well as Mr. Morse.

Mr. Houston thought that Millerism should also be included in the benefits of the appropriation.

Personal jokes were exchanged between Mr. Stanly and Mr. Johnson on the subject. The amendment was reduced to writing, and read by the Clerk:

Provided, That one-half of the said sum shall be appropriated for trying mesmeric experiments, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Mason raised the point of order that the amendment was not bona fide, and that "such amendments were calculated to injure the character of the House." The chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled the amendment in order, saying that in his opinion it "would require a scientific analysis to determine how far the magnetism of mesmerism was analogous to that to be employed in the telegraph." The amendment received 22 ayes. There was then, be it noted, no dignified protest on the ground of "paternal government," although the title of the bill contemplated the possible establishment of a "system of Government telegraphs."

Cave Johnson led off in the derisive reception and treatment of the proposition, and maintained the frivolity to the end of the consideration. But Cave Johnson had and improved an opportunity to show his statesmanship and—if you please—his honorable and courageous spirit, when he became the Postmaster-General of the United States. I suppose that no one will undertake to say that there has been a Jeffersonian Democrat more loyal to party creed than Cave Johnson?

At first, after he had been installed in his high office, he doubted whether the revenue from the telegraph would pay expenses. But what said Cave Johnson in a report to the President of the United States two years after he took the portfolio of the Post-Office—in 1846?

Postmaster-General Johnson said:

I deem it my duty to bring to your notice the fact that the subject of telegraphic communications in their fullest extent, as made available by means of this extraordinary invention (Morse's telegraph), is forcing itself upon the public. The proprietors of the patent, securing the exclusive use of the telegraph, have, since the last Congress, taken the most active measures to establish lines of communication between the principal cities of the Union. Their success will introduce a means of communicating intelligence amply sufficient for a great variety of purposes, and greatly superior in dispatch to the public mails, and must secure to itself much of the business that has heretofore been transacted through them, and to that extent diminish the revenue of the Department. It becomes then a question of great importance how far the Government will allow individuals to divide with it the business of transmitting intelligence—an important duty confided to it by the Constitution, necessarily and properly exclusive.

* * * * * * *

In the hands of individuals or associations the telegraph may become the most potent instrument the world ever knew to effect sudden and large speculation—

What a mantle of prophecy was on this old Democratic Postmaster-General when he wrote this—to rob the many of their just advantages and concentrate them upon the few. If permitted by the Government to be thus held, the public can have no security that it will not be wielded for their injury rather than their benefit.

* * * * * * *

Its importance to the public does not consist in any probable income that can ever be derived from it, but as an agent vastly superior to any other ever devised by the genius of man for the diffusion of intelligence, which may be accomplished with almost the rapidity of light to any part of the Republic. Its value in all commercial transactions to individuals having the control of it could not be overestimated. The use of an instrument so powerful for good or evil can not with safety be left in the hands of private individuals.

I confess that it does seem to me—perhaps because of my familiarity with the main objections to the system proposed—that the obstacles in the way of its unanimous approval are altogether shadowy and unsubstantial. And one must confess to compunctions lest he appear to be wrestling with what is really unworthy of serious consideration. Yet I have endeavored to frankly review and reply to what is very earnestly put forth as grave objection to this project. Need I say, or show again, that every objection is stated and recited with the utmost cunning and with great pertinacity, and through every available avenue, by the agents and officers of the company which now virtually controls the telegraphic business of the country.

I hasten to the question that brings all these things to a point; that comes down to date with practical force. Assuming as I will, if you please, that like myself many of you wonder at the predicament we are in to-day, without a Government postal telegraph. Much in the procession of events must be left unnoticed at this time. It is all interesting from the beginning. But let me not fail to say, that I have never heard an objection raised to a postal telegraph which was not only in my judgment easily answered and overthrown, but which did not in and of itself absolutely suggest an aggressive argument in behalf of the measure.

How does it happen that we have no Government postal telegraph to-day? First of all, we have again to deplore the lack of wisdom manifested in the failure to secure all the benefits of this invention on its first announcement and production by the Postal Department of the United States. It is even painful to observe how closely the leading men of the Senate came to such realizing sense of its importance as would have brought about its purchase. Thomas H. Benton said, February 28, 1845, that "he rejoiced at the invention of the telegraph, and looked forward to the time when it would be of great value to the business and commerce of the country. But was there a call for it? Was there any provision to make it self-sustaining? He had no doubt but that the time would come when the telegraph would be extensively used and would be called for by the commerce of the country, and would pay for itself. He looked to the telegraph as an important agent for keeping railroad companies in check, and preventing them from charging the Government exorbitant prices for carrying mails."

But without going into a detailed review of the history of this matter, from the present standpoint of time and circumstance, we repeat the question: How does it happen that we have not a postal telegraph to-day? I will tell you.

Whenever the effort has been formally and earnestly made, in either House of Congress, to secure the passage of a postal telegraph bill, the proposition has been confronted by a corporation which has grown to be one of the greatest monopoly powers that ever existed on the face of the globe. Indeed, considering the amount of money actually invested in it, its strength is unparalleled. [See appendix.] I will not stop to illustrate that now; but here and there the fact will be seen as we hurry on to the close of my remarks.

Come down to 1869. On the 22d day of December of that year, Hon. C. C. Washburn, of Wisconsin, addressed the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in behalf of his proposition for Government control and management of the telegraph. His able and luminous speech, with its large addenda, deserves a re-reading to-day. Note three points in it. He asserts that the report of the House committee to whom the subject had been referred—a report which was adverse—was written in a style very much like the one hundred and twenty pages of a pamphlet laid upon the desk of members by the Western Union Telegraph Company; which pamphlet, Mr. Washburn goes on to say, "is filled with exaggerations and errors of statements from beginning to end."

Observe that he proposes to fix a uniform tariff of 20 cents for twenty words. Fourteen years ago that honored Representative stood upon this floor and here announced that such a tariff, connected with our national postal system, was reasonable and ought to be established and proclaimed. Since then how has the march of improvement gone on? Doubling, quadrupling, multiplying many times in many ways the advantage with respect to cost of construction and of operation which the great corporation then held as against the patronizing public. Why, when Mr. Washburn spoke the president of the Western Union Telegraph Company had scarcely ceased sneering at duplex telegraphy. And quadruplex and multiplex telegraphy and automatic transmissions were yet to come under the contemptuous reference of the officers of that organization, to be subsequently adopted in greater or less degree as they were forced upon their use by short and temporarily competing lines. But the great fact is that if C. C. Washburn could say on the 22d of December, 1869, that the uniform tariff of 20 cents for twenty words was a just and proper rate, as demonstrated or indicated by comparisons with government telegraphs elsewhere, it would seem that the author of bill No. 98 ought not to be subjected to derision because fourteen years later he proposes as a sufficient charge by the Government for postal-telegraph service 10 cents for ten words and 15 cents for twenty words between all the post-offices in the United States in towns of over four hundred inhabitants.

But there is one other paragraph in Mr. Washburn's speech to which especial notice ought by all means to be solicited at this time. He declared that he knew how difficult it was to reach the ear of the country with what he had to say adverse to the interest of the Western Union Telegraph Company. He asserted that if there was any one here to speak in behalf of that monopoly, every word would be instantly transmitted to the country on the "wings of lightning." He then proceeded to demand that it should be telegraphed to the country that he had claimed to have shown that the United States is the only enlightened nation on the globe that has not obtained charge of the telegraph system; and that in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland the dispatch of twenty words could be sent at a uniform rate of 1s., or 24 cents, to any part of the kingdom, a distance of over 700 miles; and that from one extreme of France to another the charge was 20 cents; that all over Belgium and Switzerland the charge is 10 cents; that in Prussia the charge was then 12½ to 37 cents; in Sweden and Norway, 30 cents; and that a message of twenty words could even then be sent from Marseilles, in the south of France, to the north of Scotland, a distance of 1,400 miles, traversing two kingdoms and crossing the Straits of Dover by submarine cable, for 55 cents. Was Mr. Washburn's request complied with? Probably every member who listens to me this day is able of his own knowledge and memory to give a negative answer.

Why have we no postal telegraph? Because this gigantic monopoly has, in the person of its officers, agents, and attorneys, come into the corridors and committee-rooms of the Capitol of the nation, and by every means within its power practically forbidden hitherto the legislation which is again and here solicited at your hands in behalf of the people of the country.

Fourteen years have elapsed since the unanswered and unanswerable speech of C. C. Washburn, of Wisconsin, was delivered upon the floor of this House; in itself a tract which, if it had been duly shed abroad at the time, would, it seems to me, have roused a sufficient degree of public attention to have resulted in a formidable effort to pass his bill at the succeeding session.

Mr. Washburn's speech was not telegraphed to the country. Even the brief paragraph which he asked to have laid upon the wires did not go by telegraph beyond the points that could be reached by the day's mail and delivery. But the report of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, in which there was a solemn declaration that telegraphing in this country was the cheapest and most reliable in the world, was carefully sent in every direction and often and conspicuously commented upon in metropolitan journals; over and over again, to the false credit of the monopoly emphasized by editorial reference and advertisement.

Why have we not a postal telegraph? Because the management of the Western Union Telegraph Company, by its own direct interference, and by means of its actual, though oft-denied, umbilical connection with the Associated Press, has succeeded in keeping the facts from the people of the country; has succeeded in substituting falsehood for the truth with respect to cost, expenditure, capacity of wires, and everything else connected with the conducting of this business. How long is this to continue? The same old game is being repeated that has been successfully played for the last fourteen years. And it is said that here and there an irrepressible advocate of such a measure as the one that lies before me may be safely left to cry out against the injustice that herein exists and in behalf of the reform that should be.

It is not merely a question of reform; not so slight a thing, comparatively speaking, as that word might here import. The passage of this House bill No. 98 would not be simply or merely the enactment of a reform measure; I do not hesitate to say that it would be a second proclamation of emancipation.

How successfully this organization has kept the facts from the people I can testify, for I have gone into as intelligent communities as there are in this country and discovered that with one or two exceptions the whole of my large audience were surprised, were amazed by the statements which I made; not one of my revelations going beyond the lines of authority from the very highest sources which I presented from my satchel and permitted every one to study who chose to look.

I would like to annex in an appendix to my speech the financial history of this great corporation, which for fourteen years at least has said to the Congress of the United States that it shall not pass a postal-telegraph bill, and which now against the renewed effort and rising popular demand for such a measure—which even the present Postmaster-General has to recognize at length—protests that the Congress of the United States shall not pass a postal-telegraph bill; except, indeed, it first provide for the purchase of its rattle-trap wires and its warehouses of antiquated instruments and its many millions of watered stock! Talk of that which is ridiculous about this advocacy! Verily our children shall rise up into years of maturity with expressions of surprise as they learn that to-day we are considering a Post-Office appropriation bill wherein there are no estimates for a postal telegraph. They will be surprised to learn, I hope, I believe, that the Congress of the United States has been successfully confronted by this mammoth corporation and forbidden to obey the command of the Constitution, which, it is again respectfully insisted, binds us upon our oaths to annex to this appropriation bill or otherwise to pass a law providing for the people that which Mr. Washburn said fourteen years ago every other enlightened nation possessed.

I have remarked that my time was too short and your reasonable indulgence too limited for an elaborate statistical argument here. But the figures abound. Against the excessive charges of the great corporation sufficient can be quoted in a few minutes. Again we have the same declaration that was made fourteen years ago about the relative cheapness of transmission; these broad and untruthful assertions being sent everywhere within the confines of the Republic and published in many forms in the leading journals of the country. With all this publicity there is a real avoiding of battle before the people. Too long has this matter or to too great an extent has this subject within the last fourteen years been kept within the chambers of committees. Only an occasional tangent debate in the Senate—once in every three or four years—and a few hours discussion in the House of Representatives in all that time. Committees are said not to have been able to report because many of the members entered upon the consideration of the subject without any professed or actual knowledge in the premises. Even enlightened Representatives, remarkable for their intelligence and information in every other respect, have been withheld from reporting conclusions by long-winded investigations upon investigations, adroitly devised and most cunningly spun out unto the end of the session.

Now, I say this subject is of paramount importance. I regret that it could not have been considered by the Committee on Appropriations on the basis of a bill or an act passed at the last session of Congress. I say it should yet be acted upon by the present Committee of Appropriations on the text of a bill passed at this session of Congress. I profess to stand here ready to meet the champions of the Western Union Telegraph Company—if there be any such in this membership—on all the questions that touch cost and expenditure, outlay and income, as well as on the general proposition of propriety and constitutional authority and constitutional command.

The charge for the ten-word dispatch from here to California has recently been reduced from $1.50 to $1. It is now ten times as much as it ought to be. You upon this side of the Rocky Mountains are not now afflicted by such extortionate charges as have burdened us on the Pacific coast; thanks to the measure of enlightenment on the subject which has been shed abroad, in spite of the monopoly, with perhaps a slight debt of gratitude to a sometime show of competition. And yet the lowest charge here, between the capital of the nation and the commercial metropolis of the country, is 30 per cent. more than it ought to be—three times what it soon would be under the operation of a proper postal-telegraph act.

As was the case in Mr. Washburn's day of advocacy so it is now, as you will observe by reference to the proceedings before the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; the monopoly is not disposed to give its figures for all its transactions and connections. As it was in Mr. Washburn's day so it is now; there is assertion that the cost of building is at a figure much greater than that which experts in the business who are not under the thumb of the Western Union Telegraph Company are ready to testify about and to demonstrate. Is it not worth while to set apart a day when on the floor of this House time shall be evenly divided between those who ask your votes for a postal-telegraph bill and any gentlemen who for any reason or reasons may take issue with us? Give a certain proportion of time to the consideration of general principles, and a certain number of hours to be dedicated to the facts and figures which bear upon the proposed legislation. In all these fourteen years have not we had committee-work enough on this subject? The entire record of that arduous committee-work is readily accessible. Do not misapprehend. The iron rules are known and understood. But with such an agreement as I have had to obtain the floor to-day could not this case be fully heard here and before our people, without waiting for an overburdened committee's report?

Mr. Chairman, for $20,000,000 I claim that you can put a sufficient number of telegraph wires over this country, properly elevated upon poles or properly insulated underground, to meet the requirements of the people, as indicated in bill No. 98. When you have planted your poles and capped them with insulators and connected them with wires and set your instruments in every post-office in towns of four hundred inhabitants or more, the cost of transmission and maintenance will be slight. The cost of the acids required is nominal. Competent telegraph operators who are not under the pressure of the monopoly can testify about this on short notice. Four hundred and eighty dollars' worth of acid works eighty-five thousand miles of wire in Great Britain.

At a charge for 10 cents for ten words, and 15 cents for twenty words, and 20 cents for thirty words, and 25 cents for forty words, and 50 cents for ninety words, the Government of the United States with an adequate extension of lines, such as are here proposed, within three years after the completion of the net-work contemplated would reap a profit from the investments. And for this establishment only a few thousand dollars need to be taken from the Treasury of the United States. The people will come forward and buy the bonds of the Government to the extent of $25,000,000; an amount which will be returned with interest within twenty or thirty succeeding years by the profits of the enlargement.

You say this is assertion. I choose to make the assertion. If it is extravagant and ridiculous, let there be an opportunity to show it. I have a right to make assertions. I am here as a Representative of a people that are almost a unit upon this proposition. I represent the great State of California, which I have traversed from one end nearly to the other in the late campaign with the pledge for this work from my lips. I was elected to this House on this mission. Assertions! Go out into that lobby, go to the committee-room at the other end of the Capitol, and hear assertions from the Western Union Telegraph Company. Not quite so defiant and insolent are its agents and officers as they were eight years ago, when I myself saw the president of the Western Union Telegraph Company sitting at the head of a committee table in the seat of the chairman, and, in concert with his vulgar attorney at his side, cross-examining and bullyragging witnesses at the start. I assert nothing which I can not prove.

I do not expect this House, or any member of it, to vote on my bare assertion. All are capable of adequately informing themselves from other sources. But I do not wish you to throw my assertion one side simply because it is met with denial and derisive expressions from any lobbyist of the Western Union Telegraph Company, or from any person who has the coin or the stamped telegram blanks of that monopoly in his pocket as pay for his speech or his influence.

Again, thank God for the examples that we have. "Oh," says one, "I do not want to go to a monarchial government for an example or for statistics of any kind." Well, Switzerland is not a monarchy; France is not a monarchy. But why consider such petulant and childish expressions of prejudice? Go to England. Let us see.

I have before me a paper entitled "A Decade in the History of English Telegraphy," written and read by the chief engineer of telegraphs of Great Britain and Ireland, accompanied by his autograph letter to me, dated General Post-Office, London, June 20, 1883. From this paper and this letter and accompanying documents I may have time to present a few figures of direct and perhaps sufficient force in the premises. Before the passage of the money bill, which closed the legislation establishing a government postal telegraph in Great Britain and Ireland in 1869, the tariff in England was as follows: One shilling for twenty words under one hundred miles; 1*s.* 6*d.* for twenty words between one hundred and two hundred miles; 2*s.* for twenty words a distance above two hundred miles. The tariff to Ireland was from three to five shillings, according to distance. It will be observed that the Government of Great Britain made a change, assumed control of the telegraph, at a time when the charges by the private companies were far less than the charges in this country at the time when Mr. Washburn made his speech on the floor of this House. There was but a few months' difference between the time when the English Government assumed control of the telegraph and the day when Mr. Washburn delivered the remarks to which I have referred.

And here let attention be called to the fact that in Great Britain all the changes referred to and all the great reforms there with respect to the postal system have been secured in face of great opposition. When they were first suggested there was the loud laugh betraying the vulgar or the venal mind, or the owl-wise stare and accompanying contemptuous rebuff of many so-called leading statesmen. It was so when John Palmer, of Bath, who is as deserving of a statue at the Exchange in London as is Rowland Hill himself—it was so when John Palmer suggested that the mail-bags be taken from the post-boy and put upon the mail-coach. And yet, shortly after he had been "hailed as a fool for his folly," the British Government engaged Mr. Palmer as controller-general of the post-offices, giving him a salary of $75,000 per annum, with 2½ per cent. upon any excess in the net revenue over £240,000. And while so much of this record is inserted it may be well to mention the fact that soon after his employment it was discovered that John Palmer's income far exceeded the expectations of the government; and that in 1792 he was pensioned with an allowance of $15,000 a year; and that subsequently, in 1813, he received a parliamentary grant of $250,000. It is precisely one hundred years since John Palmer was called to London by Mr. Pitt to take the position of controller-general of the post-offices and "to establish one of the greatest reforms ever effected in the department"—a good centennial year for the passage of House bill No. 98, on the files of the Forty-eighth Congress.

John Palmer was derided as a man devoid of common sense when he first made his proposition. If Guiteau had flourished before his day and been notorious at Newgate, John Palmer would doubtless have been called "crank." Ives Scudamore, as well as Sir Rowland Hill, had to confront at first something of popular opprobrium, excited of course by the lords of the admiralty or their associates. But the mail-coach did supersede the post-boy, and the penny-postage plan was adopted, and the Government of Great Britain, when there was nothing like the extortion of which we have had to complain, did establish the government postal-telegraph system. And this was due to the force of public sentiment. The discovery by Pitt in behalf of Palmer, and by Wallace in behalf of Rowland Hill, and the ultimate adoption of the plans of Mr. Ives Scudamore were due in first and foremost degree to the demand of the people. Please make a note of this point.

The great mass of the people of Great Britain and Ireland is confessedly not so intelligent as our people; by no manner of means so well educated as the vast majority of the people of this country. But there is a public opinion on all such subjects as this. Why have we no postal telegraph in the United States to-day? Because the Western Union Telegraph Company has succeeded, by means direct and by its virtual copartnership with the Associated Press, to keep from the majority of our fellow-citizens a knowledge of the facts that belong in this case and this cause.

In 1869 the total number of telegraph offices in Great Britain and Ireland was 2,488. March 31, 1883, the number was 5,742. In 1869 the total number of messages transmitted by the private companies was 6,000,000 to 6,500,000. During the year ending March 31, 1883, the number of messages was 32,193,294. The number of messages transmitted by the Western Union Telegraph Company during last year was 40,000,000; less than 8,000,000 in excess of the number of messages sent in Great Britain and Ireland.

Now, think of it. Consider the distance in our country and compare the figures. Judge, estimate for yourselves the probable increase of patronage with the low uniform rates fixed in my bill. Of course we all know that London is the largest city in the world and the commercial center of the globe; of course we know that Great Britain and Ireland are densely populated; but let all the facts in this relation go together. There are 36,000,000 of people against our 50,000,000. There are trains running from one end of the country to the other within twenty-four hours—running at a rate of speed varying from forty to fifty miles an hour and bearing the mails of the country. There are comparatively fewer persons desirous or capable of using the telegraph, and there is only a day's march distance of seven hundred miles as against our 3,000 miles. In that country there has been an equally rapid multiplication in the patronage of the telegraph—in fact, a greater increase when you consider the three years or more which are added in the comparisons made for the Western Union Telegraph Company. Surely this need not be dwelt upon, even if my time allowed it. Here is abundant evidence, which can be supplemented by the record from other European countries, that a low uniform tariff brings an enormous addition of patronage in a thickly, compactly settled country. It is a repetition of the experience of Belgium and Switzerland; but I quote it in preference, because it can be read of all men and then inquired into by any one among us disposed to study the subject. With that ratio of desire and disposition and will to patronize the telegraph in proportion as the distance increases, is there not here an argument unanswerable and overwhelming to show that a low uniform rate would pay the Government of the United States? The calculation is easy on the few figures submitted. Ten cents for 40,000,000 dispatches is what? Ten cents for 100,000,000 dispatches per annum within two years after the establishment of a Government postal telegraph is what? Will it pay? Why, we are among the simplicities of business arithmetic.

But you must not pass a postal-telegraph bill until you shall have paid the widows and orphans! That is to say, until you shall have paid Jay Gould and his associates sixty to sixty-five millions of dollars for a property that is not intrinsically worth fifteen millions of dollars to-day. Well I know how they have built up their bunch of figures. I wish that their tables had been called off in a speech delivered on this floor, so that the record could be put side by side in parallel columns.

This great monopoly has so suppressed the facts with respect to telegraphy that there are thousands of good people who believe that a certain bill, which they have not read or heard epitomized, to wit, House bill No. 98, if passed by this Congress, would involve this country in an enormous debt, and all to no practical benefit; whereas the fact is, tested by the experience of Great Britain alone, that the establishment of a Government postal telegraph under such measure as the one before me would bring to the hearthstones of the people such enlarged facilities for intercommunication as a postal telegraph presumes and provides, with a small outlay supplied by the people themselves and gladly and joyfully paid into the Treasury of the United States; a comparatively trifling construction expenditure, to be ultimately and quickly returned from the profits of a telegraph line worked at no higher rates than those named in House bill No. 98, under the supervision of the Postmaster-General of the United States.

During many years, as I have a scrap-book full of editorial items to show, from 1869 to 1882, it was announced in leading journals from one end of this country to the other that the British postal telegraph was "a failure;" that it was run at a great loss on current expenses. And this was stated by journals that otherwise bore a good character for truth and veracity. Vainly did we appeal to the editors to give the facts. I will append a table at the end of my speech that will close out the availability of that falsehood.

These fibs with respect to the English Government telegraph have been circulated up to a very late day, and yet in the American Cyclopedia, a well-known standard authority, which is supposed to be in the library of every daily newspaper in the land, at so early a date as 1871 the following is to be found:

The return has been presented to the British house of commons respecting the financial results of the transfer of the telegraph to the government. It shows that the transfer of the telegraph to the government has been productive of most satisfactory results. Assuming the capital expenditure up to the present time to be £7,800,000, or $39,000,000, the government is earning the gross annual revenue of 10 per cent., that is £750,000, or $3,750,000. And the working expenses are not more than 53 per cent. of the revenue.

With this presumably staring them in the face there have been thirteen years of falsification on the subject.

And now comes Dr. Norvin Green into the committee-room of the Senate of the United States with a public statement, whereunto he affixes an article which appeared in the London Times and a speech by a member of Parliament who appears to have been brought under the seductive influence of the Western Union Telegraph Company. Now, it is no wonder that the Times mourns the day of the establishment of a postal telegraph. Before that time it had, comparatively speaking, a great advantage over its contemporaries, and especially over the journals published outside of the metropolis. It is impossible to go into details with respect to this matter, which are very interesting and which are argumentative in behalf of the postal-telegraph system. But it should be stated that before the establishment of the English postal telegraph the Times was a far greater power than it is to-day. It acquired in its zenith days the name of the Thunderer; but now, let it thunder never so loudly, it is Jove no longer! The facilities secured to the country press by the Government telegraph have changed all that. People are apt to read their editorial information and advice in the same paper where they are accustomed to look for their latest telegraphic news. I shall desire to append a letter written to me last summer by Mr. Graves, the chief engineer of English telegraphs, because of its bearing upon this among other points. The interior press of the country should take special notice of it. At the same time I deprecate being led off into minor matters, into little side questions, wherein the Western Union management delight, and whereby the monopoly has been in the habit of securing delay on the part of Congress. Let us have a postal telegraph in this country, and then talk about these matters afterwards.

But since I have alluded to it, I might say that Mr. Pender's statement in behalf of the Western Union Telegraph Company can only be excused on the supposition that while he was brought into an audience with our monopoly management, he never studied the record of the postal-telegraph system in his own country. For if Mr. Pender is correct, then Mr. Graves, the chief engineer of telegraphs, and Postmaster General Fawcett are all wrong.

The fact of it is, Dr. Norvin Green and company (how large a party of "widows and orphans" there were in the vessel I do not know) went abroad last year or the year before in the endeavor to float some of Jay Gould's Western Union Telegraph stock on the foreign market. But while our English cousins and our German ancestors have been badly bitten by railroad securities issued in this country, they were not quite so stupid as to make any large investments in the watered paper of this conscienceless and rotten corporation.

Here is a little pamphlet that has been circulated through the post-office boxes of Congress, at the expense, I doubt not, of the Western Union Telegraph Company, though the managers have not their names upon it, in which it is asserted that the chief authorities in the British Government wish to make a sale of the telegraphs to private companies. I have a letter from the chief engineer, dated a fortnight ago, in which he speaks of the intention to reduce the uniform rate to 6*d.* for twenty words within the next eighteen months.

Mr. Chairman, why is this desperate fight made, whenever the proposition is brought forward, to prevent the Congress of the United States from doing that which the Parliament of Great Britain saw fit to do under far less inducing circumstances fifteen years ago? I will tell you. The profits of the telegraphing business proper are enormous; but it is something more, something besides this that is to be considered.

Twelve or fifteen months ago there met in the city of Bridgeport, Conn., according to the slip which I have here from the Bridgeport Standard, a number of gentlemen who were associated in the directory of the Western Union Telegraph Company; and the Standard says:

It is estimated that the united wealth of the board amounts to $370,000,000, and that there is not a man on it worth less than $10,000,000.

Of course I do not know what other business connections these gentlemen have or may have had, nor could I undertake to define exclusively the sources of wealth possessed by any one of them. But here is a well authenticated statement, for the name of one of the directors who is a citizen of Bridgeport is published in the article in a way that suggests his responsibility for the calculation. I say it might be that the opulence of these gentlemen came exclusively from their association in the telegraph monopoly, and the probabilities are in that direction. You reply that the total capital stock is but $80,000,000, and allowing the actual investments of stockholders, including the original ownership of purchased lines, to be not over $15,000,000, and adding up the profits which have been published, there is not sufficient to account for the $370,000,000 in the possession of these few men. That is probably so. And yet, I assert, it would not be strange if all this wealth or an equal amount of wealth among these individuals could be traced to their alliance in and connection with the Western Union Telegraph Company.

Answer this question: If low uniform rates will pay profits, and if low uniform rates will pay larger profits than the present extortionate rates, why does not the directory adopt them? I will tell you; and the answer to this question answers the one that I have just repeated. It is in the interest of the Western Union Telegraph Company, or it has been in the interest of the Western Union Telegraph Company, to suppress invention. The fact of such suppression can be easily proved. It is still in the interest of the Western Union Telegraph Company's management to keep up prices at the highest possible figure, because the management do not desire to have the people, the general public, by individual effort, or by simple and many associations, enjoy the benefits of the latest possible dispatches giving the commercial quotations of the world. How the directory can obtain great profits to themselves by a monopoly of the commercial news a few hours in advance of others has been already sufficiently stated or indicated upon the floor of this House. "Ah, but they would not do it. These honorable gentlemen and their saintly predecessors would not dream of such a thing as taking advantage of their exclusive knowledge of the distant market quotations!" I have been astounded at the innocence, I will not say the gullibility, of intelligent men in extending an overplus of charity with respect to this matter. Are these gentlemen of the directory of the Western Union Telegraph Company of such apostolic scrupulosity in their business transactions that they would not day by day and hour by hour secretly but certainly use the advantage they possess? Are there any other such business men on earth? Given the advantage, do you mean to say that this business firm will not and does not "improve" it? "They would not do it?" That is precisely what they do; and there is where incalculable profits may be reaped.

A few years ago I was associated in the management of a daily journal in San Francisco which received telegraphic dispatches in cipher. There was a great fire at Hunter's Point, Brooklyn, in which was consumed the Hunter Coal-Oil Refining Works, which at that time largely supplied the California market. The conflagration was so extensive that it is said to have lighted up the East River front of New York from Harlem to Wall street. A recent similar conflagration may have given some of my fellow-members a personal knowledge of the extent and brilliancy of the illumination. The flames are said to have "lighted the city of New York." But not a syllable of tidings of this great fire came across in the dispatches of the Associated Press. Only those merchants in San Francisco who were wise enough to take the journal for which the dispatches that came in cipher were prepared were saved on the following morning from selling their coal-oil to the very early-calling customer, the alleged agent of the telegraph management, by reading the news which we alone supplied.

"Oh, but this is only one instance. If these orphans were in the habit of manipulating things in that way we should have many other such instances on the open record." Not so. They are to be credited with wisdom in their day and generation. Rather am I not justified in saying that was an exceptional discovery, not an isolated transaction?

Are you not all acquainted with the manner in which a Cincinnati broker named Davis was compelled to relinquish his business as a dealer in market news; an illustrative case often and forcibly stated by Mr. Gardiner G. Hubbard?

The merchants, the farmers, and all other producers in this country, as well as the manufacturers, are vitally interested in this movement for a postal telegraph. Not alone the railroad company in California but the telegraph monopoly as well takes its constant and its immense percentage from the profits of the toilers and the small capitalists without hazard of loss; the railroad by freight charges, based on "what the traffic will bear," and the telegraph management by the possession and the manipulation of the market quotations of the world. And I charge it upon the floor of this House that in these lines now indicated the Western Union Telegraph monopoly has more than fulfilled the prophecy written by Cave Johnson, Democratic Postmaster-General, in 1846. [Applause.]

I have urged attention to the suppression which has succeeded in preventing the formation of a just public sentiment touching this subject. And I believe that in it there is an effective appeal to the members upon both sides of this House. This is a matter for non-partisan legislation, and I have always presented it as such. But here comes the lobbyist of the Western Union Telegraph Company and whispers "paternal government." And that is supposed to be a talismanic, a cabalistic phrase that will charm this side of the House and operate so as to quench or defeat any effort to get a majority here in behalf of this measure. I have heard men lisping that within the last few days on the outside of these curtains, before the hour for clearing the floor, who I have reason to believe can not spell either one of the words that they pronounce with such oracular slickness or pomposity.

Public opinion! In many respects it does not exist in this country. How is it with the personal reputation here? "Fame" has been so manufactured by the Western Union Telegraph Company and its associate as to afford startling illustrations of the power of these twins in controlling and shaping the general estimation of men in public life. Why even I—informed and forewarned as I was or ought to have been—even I went into yonder Senate gallery several years ago, seduced to the visit by the repeated proclamations that had gone abroad, as it afterward appeared, under the suggestions of the great monopoly. I visited the gallery for the purpose of listening to an announced speaker who I had been led to believe was a sort of compound of Webster, Calhoun, and Tristam Burges all in one, and all at one and the same time. I sat there in that crowded gallery, in the midst of aromatic types of American and African civilization, sustained for three long mortal hours by the grace of patience and a bottle of camphor, in order that I might listen to this oratorical wonder. And at last he rose and spoke. And thenceforth, as a reporter, I could testify that for grammatical inaccuracies, for disjointed statements, for illogical deductions, for stale, flat, and unprofitable conclusions, this "champion" of the telegraph monopoly—as before and since he has proved himself to be—did not, in the performance to which I listened, come up to the dignity of the stump declamation of an average backwoods politician on a canvass for the position of a cross-road justice of the peace. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Name him.

Mr. SUMNER, of California. Oh, I must decline to do that. There are so many who might possibly come under the designation and distinction that it would be invidious for me to point out the man. [Laughter.] A short time afterward, in the same Chamber, I heard a most admirable speech from a man—an old member—whose name I had never seen in the telegraphic dispatches save in a commonplace statement or a personally disparaging sentence.

But now come these lobbyists of the telegraph monopoly—again and again returning to the charge—with an expectation of capturing a Democratic majority with those words of necromancy, "paternal government." Especially, if not exclusively, comes the suggestion to this side of the House: "Oh, there is no danger that Mr. SUMNER or any other pleader for a postal telegraph will obtain a listening audience upon his side of the Chamber, because we can close the ears of all Democrats against such an advocacy by injecting those six syllables beforehand—'paternal government.'" Of course I have had a different opinion of my colleagues from that which the quoted brag imports, and this circle of hearers confirms my judgment.

But let me ask, how comes it that these lobbyists linger with such affectionate appeals and intonations on this side of the Chamber? Have the orphans of the Western Union Telegraph Company any concern in the maintenance or promotion of Democratic principles? We have the testimony of Jay Gould himself that he was a Democrat or Republican as suited his temporary residence or immediate needs, being an Erie Railroad man always.

Now, I say that this is a strictly non-partisan measure. But look you, my Democratic brethren, since appeal is centered here: Do you know why Samuel J. Tilden was not inaugurated President of the United States? I will tell you. Do you remember those days of disquietude, of doubt, of anxious solicitude from November, 1876, to late in February, 1877? Recall them, while I tell you why Samuel J. Tilden was not installed in the Presidential chair. It was the general belief, which subsequent events or disclosures have shown to be well founded, that in the event of Mr. Tilden's inauguration Montgomery Blair would be Postmaster-General. And Montgomery Blair was uncompromisingly in favor of a postal telegraph. He was not a man to play into the hands of the monopoly by making general, discursive, or rice-water recommendations of reform or the establishment of a system and then say and do no more about it; thus giving a false hope, and preventing others in authority from acting aggressively and initiatorily in the cause. The monopoly did not fear weak showings and advice from other pens and under other auspices. But it would not be safe to permit Samuel J. Tilden, with such a Postmaster-General in mind, to take the executive seat to which he had been chosen. And what was the work put in train against that deprecated act of installation?

I have spoken about the shaping and suppressing of public sentiment by this great monopoly, to the injury of public and private enterprise and general welfare. Go back to those months of 1876 and 1877, when the Democracy of Indiana, in conjunction with no inconsiderable portion of the honest Republicans of that State, were organizing, as they had a right to do, for the purpose of seeing to it that the most comfortable doctrine of the Constitution, to wit, that a majority shall rule, was exemplified in the inauguration of Mr. Tilden. Then and thereupon there was poured into that State a flood of dispatches, dated in every other Commonwealth, declaring that all that the Democracy elsewhere desired at that particular juncture—desired above everything else—was peace! War was threatened! Grant and Sherman were gathering the regular Army and the artillery at Washington; and the Democrats of every other Commonwealth were down on their knees praying for peace; and it was deplorable that the Indiana Democracy should think of such a thing as organizing in the cause that had been announced. This was about the tone and substance of the telegraphic appeal. The imploring was reiterated in the ears of our Indiana brethren from every quarter, "Let us have peace! Hush! Do not hold public meetings demanding the inauguration of Mr. Tilden. Do not join leagues where there is an obligation to attend at the seat of Government on the 4th of next March duly equipped and provided as the law directs. For Heaven's sake, do not do anything of that kind." The Democracy all over the surrounding country was supposed to be in an attitude of supplication; at one time prostrate, with their faces toward the excited yeomen of the West, begging them to desist from their public demonstrations and to repair to their homes and to make no more noise of challenge or threat with respect to the inauguration of the next President of the United States. Is not that history?

And then it was the same when the people of California were organizing in the same direction. And I confess to you frankly, Mr. Chairman, that we were organizing as Democrats and as loyal citizens of this Republic with a view to join our comrades in a goodly representation, and see to it that Samuel J. Tilden was duly inaugurated in the office of the Chief Executive. And I declare to you it would have been cowardly and unpatriotic if we had not been so engaged. Then the wires that crossed the plains were burdened with beseechings to go no further in that business. All that the leading Democrats, all that the mass of the Democracy east of the Rocky Mountains desired was peace. And to us there came very soon tidings that the Democracy of Indiana had repented them of the evil of their public assemblings and their drill-room exercises, as loyal soldiers of the Government of our fathers. And soon it came to us—for to us, who were in a comparatively isolated position, it was safer to be more particular and undisguised in the messages—soon it came to us that it was very probable that "peace" meant the inauguration of—of—of—Mr. Chairman, what is the name of that man who drew Samuel J. Tilden's salary for four years? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Hayes.

Mr. SUMNER, of California. Oh, yes! Ha-a-a-y-es. [Renewed laughter.]

And when the people of South Carolina were warm in their lawful desire and determination to contribute to the placing in office of the man who had been elected President of the United States, was it not telegraphed all over the country that the citizens of South Carolina did not care whether Mr. Tilden was put in or kept out? In fact, was it not telegraphed that the Democracy of South Carolina did not like Mr. Tilden very much any way? That while it was true that they did not know much about—that is, referring, of course, to the intelligent portion of the citizens there, who had legitimate residence in the Commonwealth—did not know much about this man, this man——

A MEMBER (interrupting). Hayes.

Mr. SUMNER, of California. This man Hayes—without knowing much of him—they had no preference for the man elected. All they wanted was peace. And if peace meant Hayes in the Presidential chair, well and good; there was no sentiment there that amounted to a market-day excitement one way or the other. Is not this history within your own knowledge?

The "sensitive business interests of the country" required that a man who had not been elected President should be inaugurated! That was one of the choice iterations of the monopoly, while it was misrepresenting, suppressing, and demoralizing public sentiment on the main question. Do we not know—have we not since learned, if we ourselves were not wise enough to understand it all along—that the sensitiveness of the business of the country would have been with the right and justice of the issue, if the monopolists that controlled in great part the telegraphic news of the country had not deceived the masses in one section of the Union by false reports as to the popular opinion, wish, and will in every other section?

Have you forgotten the evidence of Republican partisanship given by the Western Union Telegraph Company in the careful preservation of cipher telegrams that passed between a person for whose actions in the premises Mr. Tilden was in no sense responsible and some of the venal men who claimed that they held on sale certain electoral votes of the South? Has the fact of the wholesale and complete destruction of the telegraphic correspondence of contemporaneous dates that passed between Republican managers in the South and North, slipped from your memories? The whole record with respect to this matter should come again before the minds of gentlemen on this side of the House, in view of the appeal to which I have referred; and as a sufficient answer to the present claim of non-partisanship in all "business arrangements" by the Western Union Telegraph Company (a claim only modified or qualified by a pretense, in certain instances, that if there is just now any instinctive or inevitable leaning toward any party, it may be seen with the aid of a political theodolite to be in the direction of the Democratic organization!).

Yesterday, or seven or eight years ago, it was the Democratic party that must be traduced. Are our Republican friends confident that this year and the next it will not be to the interest of the telegraph monopoly to defeat their candidate for President?

Talk of partisan control of the telegraph! There can be no such thing under Government management. But it exists to-day without any salt of honor in it.

But now come the lobbyists of the Western Union Telegraph Company to the Democratic side of the Hall of the House of Representatives and prate about "paternal government." Oh, how they love the Democratic party! And now they will tell you—now that there is a Democratic majority in this Chamber, and a majority for a postal-telegraph bill in the Senate—now they will tell you that they have got a corps of officers who are everything short of being lineal descendants of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, and Andrew Jackson.

I have even heard it intimated that if we will refrain from taking any action in a postal telegraph way at this session of Congress, and will nominate a President (or perchance a Vice-President—in a certain contingency) who is agreeable to their brotherhood, they will lend a sort of corporation support to the ticket. Is there any man on this side of the House to be caught by any such suggestion as that? I wot not.

What these monopolists look for in this respect, is to get a man after their own heart on both tickets and then choose the most subservient, or the one that for any discovered reasons can be controlled by them to the greatest extent.

One other suggestion I must not forget. It is said we are now having and we are going to have great and growing and permanent competition. Well, gentlemen, you have got the retrospect of the last fifteen or twenty years. You know what that signifies. Oh, yes; oh, yes! The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company will give us enduring competition. And Johnny Mackay, from the Virginia Bonanza and the Parisian Arch of Triumph, is going to give us competition. Why, Johnny will even carry letters for the Government, on certain trunk routes, for half a cent a word. So he will—if you give him all the business of the Government, with a license to charge his own rates on the feeding branches. So Johnny could really afford to do, with lines all over the country. That I admit. And that is in vindication of the terms set down in my bill; which provide for a profit during the first years, adequate to meet all possible incidental and extraordinary expenses connected with the establishmont of a new line; more than adequate—far more—if maintained to the end of a decade of years, than would be necessary in order to return the twenty-five millions called for in my bill. But are you to be deluded any longer with a promise of competition? Do you not know that competition to-day means consolidation day after to-morrow? Tide along and tide along, and still maintain rates at exorbitant figures, with secret pooling arrangements all the while. Is not this the old worn-out trick of these monpolies? At least, gentlemen, say if you will that you flatly refuse to establish a postal telegraph. But do not say, nor permit any man to say for you, that you base your declination upon a belief in reform rates by competition. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken in the homely, unstudied phrase of our Western folks, not only as one claiming to represent the people on a general basis of understanding and conviction, but also as specially authorized and directed by the resolutions of chambers of commerce, boards of trade, labor societies, and honest anti-monopoly leagues. In all recent public political meetings in my State the people assembled have unanimously urged the passage of this measure which I present, and their petitions are here in different forms for your inspection.

Mr. Chairman, there is no other method for the obtaining and the maintaining of just and judicious management of telegraphs in this country save and except by a Government postal-telegraph enactment. The people of this country are entitled to telegraphic services at figures which come close to the actual expenditures in the business and a fair interest on the cost of the plant. In no other way will the people and the majority of the people, and practically all the people, have the benefits of this great and surpassingly marvelous invention. Our fathers "builded wiser than they knew;" for the Constitution which they framed doth command the passage of such a measure as is advocated.

There is a picture of the political and the social and the intellectual and the moral advantages which would spring inevitably—ever-enlarging in their beneficence—from the establishment that is now sought at your hands and under an appeal to the obligations imposed by your oaths. I have not time to dwell upon its features. What a web of amity would be woven by this lacing and interlacing of electric wire! And while some may say it is too early in this century or too late in this session for the passage of such a measure as House bill No. 98, I shall retain to the last hours for reasonable expectation the hope and the belief, that before this division of our official lifetime shall close, this country will have had their postal facilities enlarged by the legal grant of authority to the Postmaster-General to forthwith proceed to prepare and publish specifications for the building of postal-telegraph lines throughout the length and breadth of the United States of America. [Applause.]

APPENDIX A.

HOW THE WESTERN UNION STOCK HAS BEEN WATERED.

The Western Union Telegraph Company is one of the greatest, and it is the most exacting, the most extortionate, the most corrupt, monopoly in our land. I have given it all due credit. At least as early as 1855 its history as a swindle began.

Its original capital was $360,000. This was watered in 1855 and 1856 to twice the amount each time; and the capital in 1857 was $1,500,000. In 1858 this was again watered to $3,000,000. In 1863 it was again watered by again doubling the number of shares to $6,000,000. In 1864 its stock was further increased, on a purchase and extension of lines, $5,000,000, making $11,000,000 in all. In 1864 the whole stock was again doubled by issue to stockholders of an exact gift of $11,000,000 in stock dividends. This would make the stock amount to $22,000,000; but the figures of the Western Union Telegraph Company are $21,355,100. During 1865 the stock was increased by exchanges to $21,485,400. In 1866 the stock was again watered $472,300 by an issue of a stock dividend; and soon after, by consolidation with the United States Telegraph Company and by issue for the United States Pacific lines, further increased $7,179,100, making $29,156,800. In 1866, by stock in exchange for American Telegraph Company's stock, there was an increase of $4,000,000; and by a grand watering process—by an issue of stock bonus of $7,818,800—the stock was increased $11,818,800, making it $40,955,600.

The following is from an article by Gardiner G. Hubbard, which appeared in the North American Review of December, 1883:

"Consolidation invited further competition, for the Mutual Union was organized, and in 1883 the Western Union leased it lines for nine hundred and ninety-nine years for an annual rental of $500,000, thus adding another weight to the burden to be borne by the public. Nor did the Western Union then obtain a monopoly, for new competitors have started up, anxious to be consolidated. The effect of the various consolidations and stock dividends is forcibly shown by a tabular statement·

The capital of the company prior to its reorganization in 1866 was....	$10,000,000
At that time it was increased by the issue of new stock for shares in other companies.....	20,568,000
It has been subsequently increased by the issue of new stock for shares in other companies.....	20,330,000
For stock dividends in 1866	10,000,000
For stock dividends in 1879.....	5,960,608
For stock dividends in 1881	15,526,590
For stock dividends in 1881, on account of Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph shares owned by the Western Union and then divided.	4,320,000
	86,805,196
Less stock of the company purchased in 1874.....	6,805,196
	80,000,000
The stockholders have received—
Cash dividends since 1866.....	34,000,000
Stock dividends since 1879.....	25,817,198
And the company had on hand, June 30, 1883, available assets toward future stock dividends.....	15,039,000
Total dividends and undivided assets since January 1, 1866.....	74,856,000

"Since 1867 the public, besides contributing these cash dividends and assets, has paid $110,000,000, the operating expenses of the company. The sum of $20,330,000, expended in the purchase of rival lines, represents a part of the cost to the public of its vain efforts, since 1867, to procure by competition a reduction of rates. These rival lines, when purchased, become a source of expense to the Western Union, as they are generally poorly constructed, and merely duplicate existing lines; still, as they block other competitors from using the routes, they are maintained."

APPENDIX B.

GENERAL POST-OFFICE, LONDON, E. C., 20th June, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith I hand you the paper you have read—i. e., the paper I read before the Society of Telegraph Engineers in 1880—corrected up to date except as regards the figures of railway instruments, in which I take it you have little interest.

I think the paper pretty generally, though of course briefly, explains the position as it was before and after the transfer, and it is only necessary, therefore, to point out clearly the subsidiary circumstances that have affected the balance of profit and loss, and on the other hand to consider the exceptional gain that has been obtained by some portion of the public.

As regards the expenditure by telegraph companies as compared with the expenditure on the postal telegraphs, irrespective of the fact that wages have risen, there are special circumstances to be borne in mind before any comparison of figures is instituted.

Prior to 1870 (the date of the transfer) all the railways, with the exception of two or three which upheld their own telegraphs and were practically little telegraph companies as well as railway companies, were in the hands either of the Electric Telegraph Company or the Magnetic Telegraph Company.

These telegraph companies were paid for the service they rendered to the railway companies. In some cases the payment made this service directly profitable. In other cases the telegraph company, having free way-leave over the respective lines, were enabled to uphold their own plant more cheaply, because they upheld that of the railway company along with it. Beyond this, in nearly every case they had free carriage of stores and free conveyance for their servants, and generally the agreements were so worded that they might carry people over one railway to do duty on another. In these respects the position is now entirely reversed. By the act of Parliament of 1868 (telegraph act) it is enacted that every post-office wire upon a railway shall be maintained by that railway and shall be paid for by the post-office, the rate of payment (in some cases fixed by arbitration and in some cases by arrangement) is ordinarily 20*s.* per mile of wire per annum, and where there are, as is often the case, many postal wires on the same posts with railway wires, it follows that the railway companies profit by maintaining for themselves their own wires along with those of the post-office.

Then the post-office, while it has a large road system to maintain, and therefore must perpetually travel over the railways, pays fares and carriage for everything. This, of course, is a very heavy item on its debit side.

Further, the telegraph companies avoided localities that did not yield profit, and in the majority of instances had their offices at the railway stations rent free. The post-office carries wire to thousands of localities which do not yield direct remuneration, and they have offices invariably in the towns, involving a rental or a capital payment for building. These circumstances all tend to the national advantage, but of course to the disadvantage of any pecuniary comparison between the net earnings of the post-office and the telegraph companies.

The press are in an especially favorable situation. Under the old order of things a press department which represented a federation of the various telegraph companies prepared a comparatively small supply of news which was duly dispatched from London to such papers as subscribed for it. They paid varying sums according to the quantity that they were allowed to receive. Each paper received the same matter, and if it wished to be supplied with special reports by its individual representatives the messages containing the news were charged for at full rates. Now the post-office provides no news—a department of the government, it could not possibly do so—and the result has been that two separate associations, independent of the post-office entirely, and also independent of the newspapers, but depending upon the latter for custom, are in the field and are bidding against each other to purvey the fullest, most accurate, and the quickest supply of news. Each paper makes a contract with one or other or both of these associations to receive so many columns of matter, either all through the year or at particular seasons.

The associations' messages to the papers are carried by the post-office at the rate of one hundred words for 1*s.* from 7 p. m. to 7 a. m., and seventy-five words for 1*s.* during the day. This is the charge for a single copy; but if one of those associations sends thirty or forty copies of the same reports to newspapers in different towns, then the charge is only 2*d.* per hundred words for each copy transmitted, and it is upon this 2*d.* charge that the press associations base their charges to the newspapers. If any paper wishes to have an individual report, separate and distinct from those of the associations', it has to pay for it at the rate of 1*s.* per hundred words, and of late years the result of these cheap rates has been that reports of meetings, political speeches, &c., in the provinces are telegraphed as freely and at the same cheap rates as from London. In fact, a provincial newspaper, published, say, in Glasgow, often appears in the morning with equally full reports of everything transpiring throughout the kingdom with those that appear in the London papers.

I am not clear that I can usefully give you any further information, but I shall be very happy to do so if you will point out any subject of interest at which I have not glanced.

Yours, faithfully,

E. GRAVES,
Engineer in Chief Post-Office Telegraphs.

[1] The revenue shown in this table is the amount actually brought to account in each year.
[2] The payments to cable companies represent the sums actually paid in each year.
[3] The working expenses are those shown in the appropriation accounts of the telegraph vote, and do not include the telegraph expenditure incurred by the office of works in Ireland during the whole period, nor that incurred by the office of works in England since the 1st April, 1874.
[4] The expenses of the year ended 31st March, 1873, include arrears of pay for 1870 and 1871, amounting to £64,000.
[5] The expenses of the year ended 31st March, 1874, include for the first time the cost of extensions, amounting to £31,502.
[6] Arrears amounting to £30,006 were paid in this year.
[7] Pensions of redundant officers of telegraph companies, amounting to £41,695, were for the first time charged to the telegraph vote. Of this amount £24,999 was for arrears.
[8] From the 1st April, 1875, stationery has been provided for in the vote for the stationery office.
[9] Payments for the delivery of telegrams beyond one mile were treated as charges on the telegraph revenue until 31st January, 1876, but since that date they have been charged to the telegraph vote.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

the presentation of it I present the petition of Hugh Bodell, late private Company B, One hundred and ninety-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, praying to be restored to the pension-roll. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented resolutions adopted by Fuller Post, No. 38, Grand Army of the Republic, Logan, Iowa, in favor of increasing all pensions now below $8 per month to that amount, and that all the surviving soldiers of the late war be pensioned at that rate; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Sophia C. Gray, of Lenox, Iowa, praying for an amendment of the present law relative to bounties to Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of members of the bar and other citizens of Texas, representing the inadequacy of the salaries of the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States in that State, and praying for an increase thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON. I present a petition of the Louisiana Educational Society, praying that an appropriation be made for education in the State of Louisiana. As the petition relates to a very important matter, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection. It is not long.

The petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE LOUISIANA EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY,
New Orleans March 4, 1884.

To the honorable the Senate and
House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We beg leave to lay before you, on behalf of the State of Louisiana, the following statement of facts, and to submit this memorial:

The report of the superintendent of public education of the city of New Orleans for 1881 showed a total school population (6 to 18 years of age) of 61,436; a total enrollment in the public schools of the city of 24,401; and an average daily attendance in December and January (which were the months of largest attendance) of 17,135.

Although the number of educable children has largely increased since then, the superintendent reports for January, 1884, the enrollment to be only 14,482, with an average attendance of 11,070.

With an allowance of 10,000 in private and parochial schools (which is a large estimate), we still have 36,974 children in New Orleans receiving no educational instruction whatever.

The census of 1880 shows an average attendance of 15,190 (which included the months of most meager and the largest attendance). Thus you will see at a glance the large decrease in the number being educated, although the population is steadily increasing.

A corresponding retrogression exists throughout the State, and it may be safely affirmed that of the 273,845 school population of Louisiana (census of 1880) not more than 30 per cent. of them attend either public, private, or parochial schools.

In the fifteen Southern States, including the District of Columbia, the census of 1880 shows that there are 2,702,835 (white and black) of the 5,703,216 school population not enrolled in schools, and notwithstanding the efforts made by the people of these States, and the generous contributions from private sources in the North for educational purposes, the number of children unenrolled in the schools and the illiterates continue to increase.

The State and city have done much toward public education, but the illiterates are such a large proportion of the population, and poverty is so widespread, that the taxable property can not bear such a burden as must necessarily be imposed to provide for and sustain public schools.

We are aware that in so far as ignorance is the source of pauperism, crime, and a want of thrift, the State is chiefly interested and the Federal Government indirectly only, but there is a common ground on which Federal and State interests meet and blend. Good government is necessary for both, and it is equally the duty of both to see that the citizen is made capable of performing the duties of citizenship intelligently, fearlessly, honestly. Said one: "Honest enough, brave enough, and keen enough to resist corruption, defy violence, and defeat fraud."

Both are alike interested in making the masses of the people sufficiently intelligent to understand what constitutes the greatest good for the greatest number; and to comprehend also the converse of the proposition, that the good of the greatest number is the highest and best interest of the individual citizen.

We believe that the very life of the Republic and the preservation of the liberty it vouchsafes depend upon the intelligence of its people, the universal education of its citizen; that as their illiteracy increases so do the dangers to our country multiply.

In the words of Senator BLAIR: "Education, physical, intellectual, and moral, is the primal necessity." The fathers and founders of our Government so considered it. They thought that a republic could stand only in the intelligence and virtue of its citizens.

Our danger is imminent and increasing. France in 1870 realized that it was not the needle-gun, but educated Germany which so quickly brought her to defeat and submission. She was taught a bitter lesson, by which she is now profiting. Since then she has largely increased her taxation for public schools, made elementary schooling free, and attendance compulsory. Let her history teach us to educate our children, be they white or black.

But this can only be done with the liberal aid of the National Government, and unless it comes to our assistance the condition of our educational work must grow steadily worse.

We believe that a very large sum is necessary to meet the great need of the country. A bill before Congress proposes to give $15,000,000 for the first year, and to decrease the appropriation $1,000,000 each year during a period of ten years, dividing it according to the number of illiterates in each State.

We trust that some such measures may meet your approval. Some such measures are necessary to stay and roll back the tide of illiteracy in this and other States of the South, which now finds no barriers strong enough to resist it. We believe it to be the duty of Congress to make some such appropriation, and on behalf of our State we ask it to do so.

Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, declared the necessity for and the importance of public education. Said the latter in his inaugural address of 1817: "Let us by all wise and constitutional measures promote intelligence among the people, as the best means of preserving our liberties."

Presidents Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur have severally recommended it, and President Garfield said: "All the constitutional power of the nation and of the States should be summoned to meet the danger by the saving influence of universal education."

With our poverty upon us and dangers before us, we appeal to Congress to do all that can constitutionally be done to aid in the education of youth, so that we may reap the fruits of industry, integrity, and intelligence.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of S. S. Farnham and others, citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., a co-operative association of persons of small means, praying for such legislation as will enable them to settle on a suitable body of the public lands, that they may safely enter upon co-operative work, so that village life may be substituted for the isolation of farm life on the frontier. I have had quite a number of communications from people of this class. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now in session in this city. The resolutions are very brief, and I will read them as the most convenient way of stating their contents:

Whereas there is a bill now pending in Congress known as the commissioners' license bill for the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the ninth and twelfth sections thereof are favorable to the liquor interests, and as such must be injurious to the homes of many, damaging to the morals of the people, and detrimental to the prosperity of the community: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assembled in this city March 7, 1884, That we earnestly and respectfully solicit Congress not to pass said sections of this bill.

Resolved, That we heartily approve of the District Temperance Alliance, and do hereby join with them in asking for the right to vote upon the question of the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors as a beverage within said District of Columbia; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Congress forthwith.

I move that the preamble and resolutions, with the letter from the Conference transmitting the same, be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of citizens of Howell County, Missouri, praying that a pension be granted to John W. Grammar, a soldier in the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONAS presented a petition of the Louisiana Educational Society, praying that an appropriation be made for educational purposes in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLATT presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut; which was read, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
General Assembly, January Session, A. D. 1884.

Relating to the history of the military organization of the war of the Revolution.

Whereas the greater part of the original rolls and orderly books of the Connecticut officers and soldiers of the Continental army in the war of the Revolution are on file in the Pension Office, Department of the Interior, at Washington, D. C., where they are practically inaccessible to the citizens of this State, having been loaned to the General Government after the destruction of the War Department in 1800; and

Whereas the same is believed to be true of the Revolutionary rolls of all the thirteen original States; and

Whereas these rolls furnish the only official evidence in existence of the names, services, and military careers of the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war; and

Whereas it is a matter of great historic interest that these records should be preserved in a durable and accessible form, as well as a due measure of justice to the memory of the patriotic men who achieved our national independence: Therefore,

Resolved by this Assembly:

SECTION 1. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best efforts to cause Congress to adopt the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions, and make provision for collecting materials for and for publishing a complete "history of the military organizations of the war of the Revolution."

SEC. 2. That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a certified copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Passed February 20, 1884.

SENATE.

Passed February 27, 1884.

Mr. PLATT. The State of Connecticut and its people have felt that these records ought to be returned by the General Government to the State, and have from time to time made such efforts to obtain their return as seemed right and proper. Now that the Commissioner of Pensions has recommended that they be published, the Legislature of the State of Connecticut seems to fall in with that suggestion, and I take this opportunity to commend the matter to the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom I move that the resolution be referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented resolutions adopted by McEwan Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, of North Vernon, Ind., and resolutions adopted by Gust. Abbott Post, No. 113, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, of Waymansville, Bartholomew County, Indiana, in favor of the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Madison County, Indiana, praying that Mrs. Samantha Harriman, widow of Isaac M. May, late major Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers, be restored to the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 64) to authorize suits in the Court of Claims in certain cases therein mentioned, to report it adversely. I desire that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1090) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States establishing the times, places, and provisions for holding terms of the district court in the northern district of New York, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2824) to amend sections 4, 5, and 9 of an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places for holding courts in said districts," and to provide for holding terms of the court of the western judicial district of Texas at the city of El Paso, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1577) to provide for the bringing of suits by citizens of the United States against the Government thereof in certain cases, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1743) for the relief of the legal representatives of Matthew Smith, to report it back. The bill having been inadvertently referred to that committee, and being properly under the cognizance of another committee, I ask that the Committee on Private Land Claims be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1781) to provide for the sale of the Kickapoo diminished reservation, in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1782) to declare the true intent and meaning of the acts of June 19, 1878, chapter 30, and of June 27, 1879, chapter 41; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1783) to define the routes of steam railroads entering the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1784) to resume to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1785) authorizing Joseph Guion, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to establish and maintain a ferry across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, Ramsey County, Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1786) releasing to the State of Indiana the title of the United States to certain lands in said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1787) for the relief of John Smith; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know but that under the ruling made by the Chair the other morning, as the bill is in regard to bounty, it ought to go to the Committee on Pensions. I believe the Chair held the other day that questions relating to bounty should be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Most of the petitions in respect of particular bounties have been referred to the Committee on Pensions, and those in relation to the general equalization of all bounties to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is not general; it is a special, individual case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go then to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. Ought it not to go to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The course of the Senate has generally been at this session to refer matters of special bounty, in the nature of relief to a particular soldier, to the Committee on Pensions. Matters relating to the general equalization of bounty have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR. I have been on the Committee on Pensions for some Congresses, and I have no recollection that we have had occasion to consider such a question. We may have done so in some instances, but I do not remember it. I would say further that the Senator from Kansas at my left [Mr. INGALLS], who was a member of that committee for seven years, states to me that he has never known a petition of that kind to be sent to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the expression of the Senate on the subject, of course.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest, as there have been several of these cases referred to the Committee on Pensions, that at their first meeting they determine the question themselves as to whether they think they have jurisdiction, and if not, let them report all such cases back to the Senate and ask that they be referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Very good.

Mr. BLAIR. I will call the attention of the committee to the matter. The question certainly ought to be decided.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the committee will act upon it at their first meeting and determine the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1788) to prevent contraction in the currency and to increase the circulation of silver and silver certificates; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1789) for the relief of John O. Donald; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1790) granting an increase of pension to Edgar L. Dutton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1791) granting a pension to David G. Porter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAYARD introduced a bill (S. 1792) to create and establish the pilot service of the United States and to regulate the pilotage of vessels in the ports and harbors along the seacoast of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434 of the Revised Statutes, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1794) for the relief of the heirs of Edmund Cole, of Rhode Island; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1795) to authorize the establishment of export tobacco manufactories; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GROOME introduced a bill (S. 1796) granting a pension to James P. Roe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 72) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GARLAND. I should like to have the joint resolution read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

A resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

That portion of the public debt of the United States represented by notes issued under the authority of law with the quality of lawful money and as a legal tender for the payment of debts shall never exceed the sum of $350,000,000, unless the bill or bills providing for such increase of issue shall receive the concurrence of two-thirds of each House of Congress; and the votes on all such bills shall be recorded by yeas and nays on the Journal of each House.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask that the joint resolution lie on the table subject to my call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, on motion of the Senator from Arkansas, the joint resolution will lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of John Fletcher be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JAMES W. TEBBS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $1,696 to James W. Tebbs as the residue of his salary as messenger from May 5, 1879, to November 30, 1883.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the resolution be printed, together with the accompanying account and statement, and that it be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The motion was agreed to.

MEAT EXPORTATIONS.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of California, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations fifty copies of each of such papers and documents as have come or may come into the possession of said committee touching the subjects embraced in the resolution of the Senate adopted January 22, 1884, relating to the prohibitions against the importation of American meats adopted by certain foreign governments and discriminations by tariff laws, &c., against American exports, &c.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools be reprinted for the use of the Senate, the file having been exhausted, as I am informed.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENTAL POWERS—INVIOLABILITY OF CONTRACTS.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Whereas by the ninth article in addition to and in amendment of the Constitution it is provided that the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people, and by the tenth article in amendment of the Constitution it is provided that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to report as soon as practicable as to the expediency of amending the Constitution so as more fully to accomplish the object and purpose of the foregoing provisions, secure to the States respectively or to the people the powers reserved as aforesaid, and more effectually to preserve the Federal principle and nature of the Government by maintaining due limitations upon its powers, and to that end provide that Congress shall not have power to make anything but gold and silver coin a tender for the payment of debts, nor pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table, and at a future day I shall crave the indulgence of the Senate to make remarks upon it before moving its reference to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be printed and laid on the table.

EDWARD H. LADD.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate copies of all the correspondence in his possession relating to the claim of Edward H. Ladd against the United States of Colombia, so far as it may be compatible with public interest to furnish the same.

DIRECT-TAX ACCOUNTS.

Mr. VOORHEES. On the 19th of February the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], from that committee, reported adversely the bill (S. 793) to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, which was placed on the Calendar. Upon consultation with him I am authorized, at least so far as his consent is concerned, to move that bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER SWIFT & CO.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the Senate indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 567) for the relief of Alexander Swift & Co., partners, and Alexander Swift & Co. and the Niles Works. The bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Claims, and the committee made an adverse report, and at the same time that report was made the bill was indefinitely postponed. I have consulted with the Committee on Claims, and they assent to the action that I ask the Senate to take. If the indefinite postponement is reconsidered I shall then ask that the bill be recommitted to that committee, and I have also the assent of the committee to that action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate heretofore taken indefinitely postponing the bill indicated by him be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Ohio asks that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the Chair will lay before the Senate under Rule VIII Order of Business 139, being the bill (S. 573) amending an act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, approved June 5, 1882. This bill has been reported at length. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAIR. That and the following bill on the Calendar, the bill (S. 247) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes, were, when reached last Friday, laid aside informally. The bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor was under discussion at 2 o'clock. I suppose if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] insists upon the consideration of Senate bill 573 and Senate bill 247 they have precedence, but if he does not, I should like to have the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill No. 140.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that under the unanimous agreement of the Senate the bill which the Chair has laid before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole is the one that stands at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. It is the duty of the Chair, therefore, to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest that Senate bills 573 and 247 be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that they be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill now before the Senate as well as Senate bill No. 247, on the same subject, be passed over without prejudice, to retain their places at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business No. 142, being the bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. The amendment will be again reported for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 6, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

The chief of the bureau of statistics and labor shall receive an annual salary of $3,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered, the Chair understands.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). I have not announced his pair at any time, but my colleague [Mr. HALE] has been absent for several days and will be for several days longer. He is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 13; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the second section of this bill provides that the officers of the bureau shall be, among others, "a first clerk, who shall be appointed by the chief of the bureau." I suppose that it would be lawful to provide that any agent of the Government might provide himself with the necessary clerical force by his own selection, which would not make the clerk an officer within the constitutional sense; but as this bill declares this "first clerk" an officer by its terms, I would suggest to my friend from New Hampshire to vest the appointment in the head of the Interior Department, because, of course, if he be an officer, as he is declared to be, he can not be, under the Constitution, appointed by the chief of a bureau. My amendment is that he shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he also provide that this clerk shall be of a certain class, in order that he may come under the civil-service rules and be appointed under them, and not taken out from the operation of that law.

Mr. HOAR. That is another point. This would not take him out from under the operation of that law.

Mr. COCKRELL. If he is not classified it would. Under the bill as it is now he would not come under the civil-service law at all.

Mr. HOAR. I think he would.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator proposes to bring him under the Interior Department, to be designated, I suggest, in some particular class.

Mr. HOAR. That would require a separate amendment. I have no objection to it, but in my judgment there is no necessity for it. If I recollect the civil-service law, I think the head of the Department must appoint all the clerks under the provisions of that law. However that may be, let this amendment be adopted, to which my friend does not object, and then the other can be provided for also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], in section 2, line 4, to strike out "chief of the bureau" and insert "Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. HOAR. Now, if the Senator from Missouri thinks it would be more certain to come within the civil-service provision to have him designated as of a certain class, very well.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish the Senator in charge of the bill would explain what he means by "first clerk." That is a new designation.

Mr. BLAIR. As I stated in the discussion last week, much of the phraseology of this bill is taken from the Massachusetts act establishing a like bureau in that State. It not only designates the clerk as a first clerk, but it also fixes his salary further along, and in a bureau of this description there would be great propriety in having the first clerk (who necessarily would often represent the chief and should be qualified to discharge any of the peculiar functions of the chief) appointed by the chief of the bureau. I have no serious objection, however, to the modification which has been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; and I do not think there can be any objection of a serious character to the phraseology now in the bill designating the first clerk as a first clerk. I have no objection to the word "first" being stricken out if any Senator thinks there is propriety in it. It is a matter of phraseology, not important.

Mr. PLUMB. I think, Mr. President, that it would be better if you were to strike out all in relation to clerk-hire. I do not see why we should designate for this particular bureau one clerk unless we go generally into the question of clerks. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire, with whom I desire to be in accord on this matter, as he has it at heart, if it would not answer as good a purpose to strike out all about the first clerk, and to add at the close of the section:

That the necessary clerk-hire for the performance of the duties of the office be furnished by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know but that it would be just as well, but I see no reason why it would be any better. I think myself that the bill in that regard is well enough as it is. I would be very glad to conciliate any opposition, if there is any, to unessential matters in the bill by consenting to any changes that I do not think of importance; and if the Senator imagines that the language he suggests is much better, and will propose the phraseology he would like to have incorporated, I shall make no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that this language go out, unless we provide all the clerk-hire. We seem by implication to limit him to one clerk.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will repeat his suggestion, I presume there will be no difficulty in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. INGALLS. The Department of the Interior already has charge of the public lands of the United States, the control of Indian affairs, the administration of the pension system, of patents, of education, of railroads, of the geological survey of the country, and its census. The affairs of many a kingdom, ancient and modern, have been less important and less momentous than those belonging to this Department which is now administered by the Secretary of the Interior. I doubt exceedingly the wisdom of imposing any further duties upon the head of this Department; and while I am entirely in favor of the collection of these statistics and believe in their importance, my judgment is that this whole subject should be consolidated, and that the statistics of commerce, the statistics of labor, and the statistics now provided for in the Agricultural Department should be under some one head. It would result, in my opinion, in greater efficiency; the duties I am sure could be discharged with greater economy, and it is obvious that we have reached a point in national administration where the machinery which has hitherto prevailed is entirely inadequate to the functions that are to be performed. A measure is now pending for the creation of a Department of Agriculture, which is wise. We appropriated last year $80,000 for the purpose of collecting statistics under the Department of Agriculture. The bill that has been reported in the House provides this year for an appropriation of $100,000 more. And now we are asked to add to the already excessive duties that are devolved upon the Secretary of the Interior by incorporating this immense additional duty.

I trust, Mr. President, that before voting upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, which places the duty of the appointment of this clerk upon the Secretary of the Interior, we may have an expression upon the wisdom or advisability of consolidating these different bureaus under some other Department than that of the Secretary of the Interior; and if it were possible to amend at this stage of the bill, I should like to submit that question to the Senate. If the Chair can inform me whether an amendment in the second degree is now pending, I should then be advised whether an amendment could be offered to substitute the Department of Agriculture for the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). There is but one amendment pending, which is the one proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts now occupying the chair. With the leave of the Senate the Chair will modify that and have the words "head of the Department" instead of "the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. INGALLS. That will be entirely satisfactory, and will leave the question to be determined hereafter whether we shall create another bureau, whether we shall unite this with the already inordinate duties of the Secretary of the Interior, or whether all these different bureaus relating to statistics shall be classified and consolidated in one bureau that shall have charge of the whole subject.

Mr. GARLAND. On Friday, when we had this bill last up for discussion, I intimated that I should offer an amendment running in the line just suggested by the Senator from Kansas. On looking at the bill closely I find that the amendment I contemplated would necessarily be a substitute for the bill. I will now have it read, with the permission of the Senate, and after the pending amendment is through with I shall call it up and offer it as a substitute for the entire bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first ascertain whether there be objection to the amendment already proposed, which is acceptable to the gentleman having charge of the bill. It will be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 4, strike out "chief of the bureau" and insert in lieu thereof "head of the Department."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let us hear the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill to amend chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics.

Add after section 342 as follows:

SEC. 343. The chief of the Bureau of Statistics shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, annually collect and report to Congress the statistics relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, and pertinent information relating to all departments of labor and production in the United States, especially touching the pecuniary, industrial, social, educational, and sanitary condition of the laboring classes, and to the permanent prosperity of the productive industry of the whole country; and the salary of the chief of such bureau shall be $3,500.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that in order now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposes that it is in order now if it be now moved. The Senator from Arkansas, however, has merely had it read for information.

Mr. GARLAND. I asked simply to have it read for information, and intended to offer it when the Senator from New Hampshire succeeded in perfecting his bill.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not now pending, then.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Kansas that it is not wise to multiply the bureaus having charge of the collection of statistics. A certain portion of the statistics of the Government are now collected by the Secretary of State, in regard to our foreign commerce; another portion, and largely the greater portion, are now collected by the Treasury Department, and that Department is now well organized to collect all statistics in regard to commerce, navigation, manufactures, &c.

The title of the Revised Statutes just referred to by the Senator from Arkansas shows that the scope of the Bureau of Statistics is amply broad enough to embrace labor among the subjects on which statistics are to be collected. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be very easy to add to the duties of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics the collection of statistics of labor without creating any new officers or involving any great expense. In my opinion the Treasury Department is the proper Department to supervise the collection of these statistics. With the exception of the census, which is only periodical, every ten years, the Department of the Interior has but little to do with the collection of statistics as to the people of the United States. It is true that Department has charge of the Patent Office, the public lands, and Indian affairs, most of which relate to matters on the outskirts of the United States. The duties of the Indian Affairs and the Public Lands Bureaus are in the regions of the new settlements, while the statistics of labor, of manufactures, of agriculture are to be obtained mainly in the great interior of the country, largely in the manufacturing States, the Middle States and the New England States. The duties imposed by this proposed law can easily be devolved upon the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, and a few additional clerks to the present organization could do all that would be needed in that way.

I am opposed to two or three provisions of this bill. Indeed, I would not grant these powers to any Department. Here is the fourth section of the bill. In the first place, there is no defined jurisdiction of this bureau of labor statistics, but it has a head and a first clerk, and the fourth section provides—

That the chief of the bureau shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses, under oath, orally and by deposition, before himself or any assistant or magistrate to be by him designated; and such witnesses, when they fail to produce such papers or to testify voluntarily, may be summoned in the same manner and paid the same fees as witnesses in the courts of the United States where they shall reside; but no witness shall be required to produce papers or to disclose the condition of his private business or affairs against his will, provided he make oath that in his belief the same would injure his person or estate.

Here is a power that I would not confer upon any executive officer of the United States, I do not care who he is. Here is the full power of the judiciary to compel the attendance of witnesses, to summon them from remote parts of the country, to issue process of attachment; the whole judiciary power is to be exercised by the head of a subordinate bureau in one of the Departments of the Government. Why, sir, one of the most dangerous powers exercised by the Senate and the House of Representatives is the power conferred on them to send for persons and papers; and even that power has been challenged by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the action of the House itself has been reversed, at great cost to the Government of the United States, in an important case.

Now, the idea of trusting a subordinate of one of the Departments of this Government with the power to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses, and to decide what papers shall be produced, to what extent the surveillance of this officer can go over the books and papers of manufacturing establishments throughout the United States, and the rate of wages, and all this, it seems to me would be a departure from the established principles of the Government.

It is conferred upon the Senate and the House as one of the great powers necessary to legislation. It is necessarily conferred upon the courts, but only when litigants bring witnesses before the courts to be examined in the due course of the administration of justice. But to allow a subordinate officer of any Department of the Government to send his subpœnas all over the United States in this broad, wholesale way would be an exercise of power that can not be trusted to any executive officer, and should not be, without limit or restraint.

So, Mr. President, I think this section of the bill is entirely against good policy. The fifth section provides:

That the chief of said bureau may employ such assistants and incur such expense, not exceeding $15,000 in each year, as may be necessary to be incurred in the discharge of the official duties of said bureau.

Here is a bureau with a single clerk with an appropriation of $15,000, to be increased from time to time to an indefinite extent, without any limit as to its power. I am not prepared to vote for any such bill. There is no such provision made in regard to other Departments of the Government. Congress has of late years refused even to appropriate the sum of $50,000 for the contingent expenses of one of the great Departments of the Government, and I think wisely so, and yet we start a new bureau here——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled by the rules to inform the Senator from Ohio that the five minutes allotted to him have expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am about through. I am very willing to stop.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather stop than violate the rule. I have said about all I care to say. If I wish to speak further I can obviate all difficulty by offering an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that any of this discussion on this point is in order at this time, but since it has been presented I think I ought to say a word in reference to the provisions of the bill——

Mr. COCKRELL. Are we to have that rule enforced, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has just enforced the rule, and it is in operation.

Mr. COCKRELL. How often can one Senator speak?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Each Senator is entitled to speak once on any one question. The bill has just been amended, and the question now is on reporting the bill as amended to the Senate, on which no Senator has spoken except the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. INGALLS. I am quite sure unanimous consent will be given to consider this bill outside the rule. It is a bill whose discussion ought not to be limited, and I am sure consent will be given to the consumption of such time as may be thought best.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no desire to stop the Senator from New Hampshire from speaking, but I think the Senator from Ohio ought to have had permission to go on and finish his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had said about all I desired to say. I am in favor of the five-minute rule, and therefore do not want to violate it myself, because I may want to enforce it against somebody else. I am through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that a request was made that the Senator from Ohio be allowed to proceed, and he expressed a desire not to proceed, and thereupon the request was withdrawn. The Senator from New Hampshire is in order under the rule, and will proceed.

Mr. BLAIR. In regard to the first point, that this bureau had better be tucked away under the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department because there is not room in the Interior Department, I have only to say that if the bill shall become a law and be of any consequence it will occasion more work to be done by somebody somewhere, and it is of very slight consequence what caption you place over this bureau or where you actually locate it, so far as the verbiage of the statute is concerned. The duties are very important. A man of experience and of capacity must give all his time, with some assistance, to them in order that we may make the bill operative and accomplish any good for the working people of this country or its industrial interests generally. So I care very little where you locate the bureau; it will not make much difference; but I think it had better be in the Department of the Interior, where already is located the Bureau of Education, which is one of the subject-matters referred to the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate. If the Bureau of Education is in the Interior Department, there is no reason why a bureau of labor statistics should not be in the Interior Department also. The supervision of the head of the Department in any case must be merely nominal. That we all understand. I see no occasion to mar the features of the bill so far as that is concerned.

Now, in reference to the fourth section, which the Senator from Ohio complains of as vesting in this subordinate a new and alarming power, I will say that it simply gives precisely the same power which has been found to be attended with no danger whatever in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and a power which is, as far as I know, possessed by every bureau of statistics of every State government where such bureaus exist. In the fourteenth section of chapter 32 of the Public Statutes of Massachusetts, where a bureau or statistics of labor is established, I find the following:

> The bureau shall have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath, and such witnesses shall be summoned in the same manner and be paid the same fees as witnesses before the higher courts of the Commonwealth

I limited the power in drafting this bill, anticipating some such objection as this which has been made by the Senator from Ohio. There is a broad and general power given to examine witnesses in the ordinary way; there is no power to commit for contempt, because none is conferred. This is a statute officer, and unless the power to commit is given by statute no such power can be derived by implication. It can not exist at all unless it is given in express terms. This officer therefore has simply power to examine witnesses. If a witness refuses to answer the officer must find his appeal by reference to some higher power, and I do not know where he can find any higher power that can order a commitment. A committee of this body is sent out to examine witnesses, as the committee of which I am a member has been doing during the last vacation. We call in our witnesses, we pay them their fees, and they testify as they please. If they refuse to answer we simply report to the Senate, and the discretion of the Senate is exercised as to the matter of commitment. There is no arbitrary or dangerous power whatever vested either in the committee or in this officer provided for by this bill. The bill itself expressly provides:

> But no witness shall be required to produce papers or to disclose the condition of his private business or affairs against his will, provided he make oath that in his belief the same would injure his person or estate.

Now, unless there is some power to obtain data and statistics we might as well not pass the bill at all, and those who are interested in it will look upon it as the merest trifling for us to legislate on the subject.

Then as to the amount to be expended; the statute of Massachusetts appropriates to the chief of the bureau of statistics in that State $5,000 annually, to be expended in the same way that it is proposed in this bill that the chief of a like bureau having jurisdiction over the entire country shall be intrusted with the expenditure of $15,000. There is a contingent fund allowed to the Bureau of Education at the present time, there is to every head of a Department, and for aught I know to the chiefs of bureaus in the various Departments throughout the Government. At all events it is no new or unheard-of thing that a slight amount of money shall be intrusted to the discretion of an officer who must have the qualifications to earn (as we propose this man shall have a salary of) $3,500, which is $500 more than we pay to the chief of the Bureau of Education to-day.

I suppose my time is exhausted.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before the Senator sits down I should like to ask him what in his judgment the word "production" covers in the fifth line of the third section. It reads "information relating to all departments of labor and production." To what extent is the word "production" used.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose that extends to the productive results of labor. That is my idea.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then it includes the production of all manufactured goods, the production of farms and mines.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I presume that information is contained in the census very largely, is it not?

Mr. BLAIR. I assure the Senator that very generally it is not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have been listening with some attention, to see if possibly we could find some practical good to result from a bill of this kind. I understood the Senator to say a few days ago when this bill was under consideration that the labor interest required something of this kind, and yet I fail to have seen anywhere within the records of the last few years any demands of this character. It is true labor is demanding something, demanding some relief of its burdens, as I understand, and not the imposition of any more. It is demanding that taxes shall be reduced, and not that taxes shall be imposed. But unfortunately when there seems to be some feeling prevailing requiring attention, the universal panacea is a commission or else a distinct bureau.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator desire an answer to his suggestion?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I would just say to him that every extensive labor organization of the country appeared before the Committee on Education and Labor, and they universally by their leaders said that a bureau of statistics of labor was the thing which they wanted. The great popular ignorance or the ignorance of those who had their interests in charge as to the facts pertaining to the industrial condition of the people throughout the country they looked upon as the most serious hinderance to whatever appertains to their prosperity and elevation; and above all things, they said, whether there is any eight-hour legislation or whether there is anything with reference to the employment of minors in factories or anything touching the subject of education, industrial or scientific or what not, above all things give us a bureau of statistics of labor, so that the facts may be definitely ascertained and that we may appeal for legislation upon the data of certainty. I consider this bill as the one which more than all other propositions at this particular time the intelligent laboring people of the United States demand. I do not wish to see this bill seriously changed or emasculated in any degree. There is nothing here that gives opportunity for the exercise of dangerous power. There is no more power given than is absolutely necessary to ascertain the facts, and there is careful provision made, as is not the case in State statutes, that there shall be no abuse of private rights, no attack upon the sanctity of any business management of any individual, firm, or corporation by the chief of this bureau.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to enable me to make a few observations I will submit an amendment to strike out section 4 of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly have no desire to obstruct the passage of the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will first be reported to the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the chief of the bureau shall have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses, under oath, orally and by deposition, before himself or any assistant or magistrate to be by him designated; and such witnesses, when they fail to produce such papers or to testify voluntarily, may be summoned in the same manner and paid the same fees as witnesses in the courts of the United States where they shall reside; but no witness shall be required to produce papers or to disclose the condition of his private business or affairs against his will, provided he make oath that in his belief the same would injure his person or estate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly have no desire to defeat the object of the Senator from New Hampshire or do anything to prevent the production of the fullest statement of the statistics of labor; but it seems to me that we have already upon the statute-book ample machinery for that purpose, and it is scarcely worth while to organize a separate bureau in the Interior Department to gather together these statistics, and especially to give to this officer extraordinary powers that are not conferred upon any other Department or any other bureau of the Government. It is true the Senator quotes the statute of Massachusetts, which confers on the chief of the bureau of statistics of labor in that State the power to examine witnesses, but we have not yet got entirely to overlooking the difference between the National Government and the State governments. This is a Government of limited powers. The State governments can do a great many things that we can not do. The fact that we have lived nearly a hundred years in this Government without conferring upon our chiefs of bureaus and heads of Departments the power to examine witnesses and take testimony and have each of them convert himself into a little justice of the peace or a big justice of the peace, shows that there is no necessity for such a power; and therefore it ought not to be conferred.

Senators are not probably aware that we have a bureau now in full force, armed with ample machinery, having probably a hundred clerks all told, that has power to do exactly what is provided for by this bill except the power to take testimony. For instance, in regard to the Bureau of Statistics, a bureau of the Treasury Department, I find that that bureau is required to collect "the statistics of commerce and navigation," to state "the kinds, quantities, and value of the merthandise entered and cleared coastwise into and from the collection districts of the United States," * * * to "prepare and publish monthly reports of the exports and imports of the United States, including the quantities and values of goods warehoused or withdrawn from warehouse, and such other statistics relative to the trade and industry of the country as the Secretary of the Treasury may consider expedient."

Further:

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shall also prepare an annual statement of vessels registered, enrolled, and licensed under the laws of the United States, together with the class, name, tonnage, and place of registry of each vessel, and such other information as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper to embody therein.

The bureau is also required to prepare an annual statement of all merchandise passing backwards and forwards, internal and external. Then again—

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shall collect, digest, and arrange, for the use of Congress, the statistics of the manufactures of the United States, their localities, sources of raw material, markets, exchanges with the producing regions of the country, transportation of products, wages, and such other conditions as are found to affect their prosperity.

If the Senator from New Hampshire wants to broaden the scope of this last clause that I have read, let him include "labor," so that this officer who is now armed with ample power and ample machinery may inquire into the price of labor in this country compared with the price of labor in Europe, the food and the pay of the laborers, the facilities of labor, the condition of the laborers, &c. Indeed I think the labor question is becoming one of the great questions of the times, and that the laboring men of this country in all branches have a right to demand of Congress the most careful attention to their interests. They complain that they do not now receive their share of the products of labor in manufacturing and the like. That is a complaint which we ought to examine into with the greatest care. But why not include the statistics of labor as to manufactures, the wages of all the various classes of laborers, with the other statistics provided for by the existing law? All that the Senator can reasonably ask is a very short clause adding to the duties of the Bureau of Statistics the duty of investigating into the wages of labor paid in all branches of manufactures, agriculture, and commerce.

What additional safeguards can be given to laborers, what means can be brought about to benefit them, is a subject worthy of consideration. The great means, in my judgment, is by boards of arbitration. Can we not provide some mode by which a laboring man can complain to some tribunal, some court of justice, of oppression or of wrong? I think disputes between the employer and employé ought to be submitted to arbitration in some proper mode. For proper provisions of that kind I will vote with the greatest pleasure. Indeed I have been considering the subject whether I could not propose some measure that would tend to smooth down the natural contests springing up between capital and labor, and I will heartily support any measure proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire that will advance the condition, promote the interests, or aid in the prosperity of the laboring men of this country in all branches; but it seems to me that this bill will not do them any good; it will not even give them the information they want. They can get that better by a simple amendment to existing law, making a little broader the scope of the Bureau of Statistics as now organized in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARLAND. Although the amendment I contemplated offering is not now before the Senate, yet the debate has gone pretty much on that line, and I will now in a few words explain what I mean by the amendment and the object I have in view.

The present Bureau of Statistics has almost jurisdiction of this identical subject. The duties of the present Bureau of Statistics I say are so extensive and so broad as almost now to include this very subject. I wish Senators would pay attention while I read for a moment from section 335 of the Revised Statutes:

The purpose of the Bureau of Statistics is the collection, arrangement, and classification of such statistical information as may be procured, showing, or tending to show, each year the condition of the [agriculture]—

The word "agriculture" is in brackets—

manufactures, domestic trade, currency, and banks of the several States and Territories.

Then the next section provides for an annual report of commerce and navigation with foreign countries, &c.

The act when it was originally passed, as will be found in the fifth Statutes at Large, included agriculture; but when it went into the revision of 1873, in making the revision it seems the word "agriculture" was stricken out or lopped off in some way. Now, if we put in our agriculture we shall have pretty much the entire subject covered by the amendment I have offered, but I made the amendment a little larger than this for the purpose of saving what I consider to be the salient point of the bill reported by the Senator from New Hampshire. I propose that we add it simply to section 343, taking in these matters, putting them under one head, and not having them scattered between two or three different Departments.

You want to find out some statistics as to labor. Under this bill you must go to the Secretary of the Interior. You want some statistics as to manufactures. You must go the Secretary of the Treasury. That is not the proper method of attending to such matters. Put it as the Senator from Kansas says all under one head, make it the work of one man, make it one complete system. I think the amendment I contemplate offering covers the entire ground, and it gets rid of the obnoxious power that the Senator from Ohio protests against, and it gets rid of this large appropriation of $15,000 a year for a much less sum than which this entire work can be done.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that. There is an appropriation of $15,000, when the whole work contemplated by the original bill and by the amendment I have now presented can be done and executed perfectly for one-third of the amount. The amendment that I contemplate offering raises the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, as I think, proportionately with the increased duties. That is, instead of $2,500, it gives him $3,500, which addition of $1,000 is the only extra expense.

Sympathizing with the Senator from New Hampshire and with his committee throughout in their purpose of getting all this information in the most minute way, I think the proposition I make is the most practical, most sensible, and most methodical form of doing it; and I expect to offer the amendment at the proper time as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I have not spoken on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Bureau of Statistics that we hear so much about, more than we have heard since I have been a member of Congress before, was organized under a law which was passed in the year 1844, it seems, and it has just occurred to Senators in their sharp reading of the statute that it might furnish under its powers the statistics relating to the subject of labor. There have been some additions to its powers since the original act was passed, but the latest statute I see conferring any powers upon that bureau is as long ago as 1866; and yet never has there been the first fact of importance such as would come under the proper jurisdiction of a bureau of labor statistics such as it is proposed to establish by this bill been collected or circulated to the country at large.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me a moment, the most valuable production that has ever been issued by this Government or by any government in regard to labor was Mr. Young's report on labor in Europe.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is quite right in regard to that, and I was not oblivious to the fact, for I have read the book. That was, however, collected under powers that were not the essential powers of a bureau of labor statistics as it is proposed to organize it in the bill before the Senate.

The Bureau of Statistics now existing has control of the matter of commerce, wages, if they see fit to investigate touching wages which are earned in manufactures; but the powers of that bureau are essentially appertaining to what comes under the jurisdiction proper of the Treasury Department; and Senators do not, I think, conceive at all the real nature of the functions which would devolve on a bureau of labor statistics as that phrase is understood by those most interested in the subject. Whatever appertains to the actual personal condition of the laborer in our own country under the conditions of American life, whatever is necessary for the amelioration of his condition physically, socially, morally, intellectually, is the proper subject-matter of the investigations of a bureau of labor statistics, and in that direction we have absolutely nothing whatever up to the present time excepting what we may have gathered incidentally through our State Department, through our consuls abroad, and by the investigations abroad of Mr. Young, and some other work which has been done really collaterally to the great work which appertains to a bureau of labor statistics proper.

It seems to me a great incongruity to place a bureau the head of which by our previous action is to be paid $3,500 a year—and it is none too much—under a chief whose salary, which nobody has ever complained was not sufficient so far as I know, is only $2,500 by existing law.

I do not wish to weary the Senate by my own much speaking, but I do hope that this bill will pass pretty much as it came from the committee, who have thoroughly and carefully considered it and unanimously recommended it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, a few moments ago I obtained the information from the Senator from New Hampshire that the laboring interests of this country demanded this, and it occurred to me while he was making his remarks whether we had not information on which to base action upon this subject in the past. The gentleman remembers we had a commission on the tariff subject and then legislation on the tariff on the same pretense; we sugar-coated it that it was for the protection of American labor. We made the tariff exclusively on the basis that it was to protect American labor. Now my friend from New Hampshire says the laboring interest needs some statistics. I intimated to him a little while ago that the laboring interests did need something; that in my judgment they had not received what they needed; and I think my friend from New Hampshire knows and every Senator on this floor knows what is in the interest of labor as well as he will next year or the year after, when an expensive commission or a bureau has collected statistics and printed them which never will be read. My friend knows the labor interest of New Hampshire better than any bureau chief. Why, then, do you pay him $3,500 for getting them? He understands the interests of the manufacturers and the laborers in New Hampshire. When the manufacturers, by reason of the necessary operation of the law which is made for their protection, are necessarily circumscribed in the sale of their productions, and it becomes necessary for them to save a percentage on their investment, then the first thing is either to shut down their mills or put their laborers on starvation allowance, and the Senator from New Hampshire knows the fact the next morning after that is done, and so does every Senator here, and every citizen who reads the paper knows it the next morning. I fail to see how our information on such matters is to be added to, whether this bureau is organized as a separate institution or whether it be attached to some other Department of this Government.

The fact is that the workingmen can obtain by this means no more information for their protection than this body and the people know to-day. They want taxes removed; they want some legislation that will not impose the same amount on the man who labors for his daily bread and the support of his family and children as on the millionaire. They want some protection that will save them from paying into the Treasury of the United States the same amount of money that Gould or Vanderbilt pays. We understand that to-day; we can reason out that much. The laboring man who pays a half-cent duty on his sugar pays as much from his poverty into the Treasury of the United States as Gould or Vanderbilt does from his riches. Are these the kind of statistics the Senator from New Hampshire desires by this bill?

Mr. BLAIR. Precisely the kind, and a vast amount more. If the Senator wants things done which never have been done, why does he object to obtaining the necessary information, brought vividly home to Congress, well authenticated, so that sometimes we shall get the information?

Mr. VAN WYCK. That we have already, and have had it line upon line and precept upon precept; and what I desire is to go as far as the gentleman may go in protecting labor and removing from it the impositions which now rest upon it. That is what I desire to do.

Mr. BLAIR. Let us begin now with this.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Begin now, and let the laboring man not be required to pay any more money into the Treasury for the use of his sugar than does Gould or Vanderbilt; begin now, and let us see to it here that the laboring man pays no more on goods manufactured than he can buy them from abroad, because by some ingenious process in the tariff, which you make in the interest of protection to American labor, you put more duty on the coarser and cheaper articles which labor is required to purchase and consume than on the more costly fabrics which are obtained by your Goulds and Vanderbilts. I am in entire sympathy in doing what I think at heart the Senator desires to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, is there an amendment now pending to this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment pending is the proposition to strike out section 4.

Mr. SEWELL. I will wait till that is disposed of. I have an amendment to offer to section 3.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think these statistics, if they are to be procured, can very well be procured under some organization that we now have. I am not quite clear that I agree with the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Ohio that these statistics can best be procured through the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department. My view is that these statistics can best be secured under the machinery we now have in the Department of Agriculture, to which my friend from New Hampshire responds with a smile. If he will take the pains—and I have no doubt he has done so—to examine this question he will see that what we abound in now is statistics, statistical bureaus. We have them everywhere; they are in all the Departments in one way and another.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that under the law creating the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, which has been amended so often, we have never had any accurate information. He has failed to read the valuable book of Mr. Young, a great volume printed some years ago, in 1876, respecting the labor of ancient and modern Europe, Asia, Africa, and the United States. It runs clear back into ancient Egypt, and ancient Rome, Greece, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. Back to Adam's fall?

Mr. ALLISON. Very nearly. It is a complete résumé of the labor of the world for more than 2,000 years, and yet the Senator from New Hampshire has never heard of it.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, I have just been discussing it. The truth is, the Senator was so anxiously reading it for the first time himself that he had not observed the debate. I spoke explicitly of my knowledge of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I know the Senator admitted, in response to the Senator from Ohio, that he had seen it, but it seems he supposed it had never been distributed. It has been distributed for seven or eight years past. We have the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, which furnished this valuable volume some years ago. We have in the Agricultural Department a bureau of statistics which furnishes us monthly with everything relating to the wages of labor, not only of the agricultural, but of all other laboring classes—perhaps not so full and complete as the Senator desires. The Statistical Bureau in the Treasury Department, outside of the cost of printing, costs us an annual appropriation of more than $50,000. The statistical bureau in the Department of Agriculture cost us last year $109,000, and the year before a like sum, and it is proposed this year to enlarge it so that the total cost shall be $134,000. And yet the Senator from New Hampshire brings in a bill here for the purpose of securing statistics at a cost of $15,000, including the examination of witnesses and the sending for persons and papers to every part of our country.

Why, Mr. President, this is but the entering-wedge of an enormous expenditure with reference to this very subject, which if committed to either of the existing bureaus could be procured at a very small cost. What I object to is the establishment of another bureau. I am willing to enlarge the inquiry to any extent desired by Senators, whether it be committed to the Bureau of Agriculture or to the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department. They both have ample machinery under which they can gather this information. Therefore what I object to is the establishment of a new bureau, with new salaries, new compilations.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me say to the Senator from Iowa that we now have through the consular reports of the State Department statements monthly of all that is to be ascertained in relation to labor abroad.

Mr. ALLISON. So the Senator from Ohio stated a few minutes ago when the Senator from Vermont was out of his seat; and so we all understand. We have these bureaus everywhere. Now, what will this new bureau do? It will gather up from statistician Dodge whatever he may gather through the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has spoken five minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad of it, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Iowa will be allowed to proceed. I will ask him a question, and that question will be to please conclude his speech, and I will give him my time to answer it in.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no speech to make.

Mr. COCKRELL. Conclude your line of argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Iowa be allowed to proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I asked him a question, and he has my time to answer the question in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Iowa proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. I only have a word more to add. What I desire to call the attention of the Senate to is the fact that we are multiplying these bureaus. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] a day or two ago stated that the statistician in the Treasury Department borrowed statistics from the Department of Agriculture and published them.

There are duplications of these statistics coming from the State Department, the Treasury Department, and the Agricultural Department. Now, are we to have another compiler of statistics, who shall borrow from this, that, and the other Department? That is what I object to in this bill. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from New Hampshire or this Committee on Education and Labor shall present to us any new feature they desire to commit the inquiry of to some one or the other of the bureaus we now have in existence. That is all I desire to say, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. As the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] accomplishes all I desire, I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio withdraws his amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. If there is no other amendment pending, I offer mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be reported if any Senator desires it.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer an amendment to the text of the bill. I move, at the end of line 9, section 4, after the word "affairs," to insert "or the private affairs or business of another."

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Then at the end of the section I move to insert "or the person or estate of another."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the next amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, to lay before the Senate the pending business under Rule IX.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2 and 7 to the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and that it had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to make a motion that the bill (S. 1127) to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals be made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

I desire to say in support of the motion that a very dangerous contagious disease has broken out among the cattle of Kansas to an extent which has excited great alarm in all that interior portion of the country which is so much interested in this great industry, and that a similar disease, I am informed, has broken out in the State of New York, and also in the State of Maine. The Commissioner of Agriculture is being besieged by dispatches from various quarters to send veterinary surgeons and to use other means which it is supposed he has to aid in the suppression of this disease, and there is a general confession not only of interest but of the inability of States and particular localities to apply the necessary remedy. I will venture to send to the Chair a dispatch which the Commissioner of Agriculture has received, to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Kansas that there is already a special order for Tuesday, March 11, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. PLUMB. What is that, if the Chair please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits.

Mr. PLUMB. Without desiring to displace that, although I have my opinion about the relative importance of the measures, I will modify my motion that this shall be made the special order to succeed the consideration of the special order already made for to-morrow.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that there is a special order for Wednesday.

Mr. PLUMB. I think on the whole the Senator from New Jersey will agree with me that a matter which relates to the interests of a single individual can hardly be able to stand in the way of one of as much importance as the bill I propose. I do not desire to do anything for the purpose of delaying the measure to which he alludes, I will say to the Senator; but I think there will be some way of adjusting it, and a controversy need not be anticipated until it arises.

Mr. SEWELL. There are two special orders for Wednesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the motion made by the Senator from Kansas is strictly in order as originally made.

Mr. PLUMB. I will insist on it as made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the effect of it will be that the bill will go after the special order first fixed for the same hour. It will give it the practical result the Senator has suggested.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Secretary to read the dispatch which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill which he has indicated be made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock p. m. The Secretary will read the dispatch.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEOSHO FALLS, KANS., March 9, 1884.

GEORGE B. LORING,
Commissioner of Agriculture, Washington:

Arrived to-day. Contagious foot-and-mouth disease beyond a doubt. Origin unknown. Three herds infected. New cases at the rate of 10 per cent. daily. Dr. A. A. Holcomb is here by request of Governor Glick. The citizens have appointed a committee, who quarantined the infected premises, but have no authority to maintain it or the funds to stamp out the disease. The State provides no law for such cases. A large meeting of the cattle-men has been called for Tuesday next. Will you, or the United States Treasury Cattle Commission, have the funds and the authority to provide for the prompt extinction of the infected herds? Reply at once.

M. R. TRUMBOWER, V. S.

Mr. PLUMB. I now ask that the other dispatches I send up be read in the same connection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., March 4, 1884.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB:

A malignant and fatal disease has broken out among the cattle of Neosho County. I have asked Commissioner Loring to send veterinary surgeon to investigate it. Over one hundred head have been attacked. I have wired him the fact. Will you aid me in my request?

G. W. GLICK.

CHEYENNE, WYO., March 10, 1884.

Senators INGALLS and PLUMB,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The appearance of foot-and-mouth cattle disease in your State causes great alarm on the Western cattle ranges. Can you not have the House animal industry bill considered and passed at once? The Agricultural Department, co-operating with Kansas, can extirpate the disease by destroying the affected cattle.

WYOMING STOCK-GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.
JOSEPH M. CAREY, President.
THOMAS STURGIS, Secretary.

BURLINGTON, KANS., March 8, 1884.

Senators PLUMB and INGALLS, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of citizens of Coffey County a resolution was passed asking you to use your best efforts to have the pleuro-pneumonia bill so amended as that the Government will pay all the expense, and have it passed immediately, as an emergency exists which calls for prompt action; or, if not amended, have it passed as it is. Answer at once and tell us what the prospect is for its immediate passage.

J. A. KENNEDY, Secretary.
JOB THROCKMORTON, Chairman.

Ordered, That the papers relating to the claims of Herman Ruge and Cyprian T. Jenkins be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll; and

A bill (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 192) providing for the printing of certain documents relating to the unhealthfulness of swine products in the United State; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and fifty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were opened, and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 10, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. TALBOTT, for this day.

To Mr. FIEDLER, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LAIRD, indefinitely.

To Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, for sixteen days, from and after March 10, on account of important business.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that amendments numbered 2 and 7 be concurred in, and amendments numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8 be non-concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. KEIFER. I shall ask for the attention of the House for a few moments only while I explain the action of the Committee on Appropriations. And first in reference to the amendments in which concurrence is recommended.

The second amendment provides that hereafter any cadet dismissed for hazing shall not be eligible for reappointment. We have believed that to be a proper amendment and have recommended concurrence in it. As to the seventh amendment, the House provided for additional bath-tubs, and the Senate have added the words "and repairs to bath-tubs."

The committee recommend non-concurrence in the remaining amendments of the Senate.

The first amendment is for pay of treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets in addition to pay as captain of infantry, $700.

The third amendment is in reference to additional pay of professors. The Senate strike out the words "and to officers on increased rank." The committee is not certain that is material, but for the present recommend non-concurrence.

The fourth amendment provides for extra pay of enlisted man employed in the care and preservation of models, &c., in lieu of extra-duty pay, $120.

The fifth amendment increases the total from $960 to $1,080, which is merely the addition of the $120 extra pay.

The sixth amendment is for the completion of the new hospital for cadets, $5,000. It was not believed that was required, and therefore the committee recommended non-concurrence.

The eighth and last amendment is an increase in the paragraph for additional bath-tubs in cadet barracks from $2,000 to $3,000. In this non-concurrence is recommended.

No separate vote being called for, the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations were agreed to, and Senate amendments Nos. 2 and 7 were concurred in, and Senate amendments Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8 were non-concurred in.

Mr. KEIFER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF WARRIOR RIVER.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

To the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, mayor and aldermen of Tuscaloosa, Ala., acting in behalf of the citizens whom they represent, respectfully ask your honorable body to appropriate money for the purpose of opening to navigation the Warrior River, above Tuscaloosa, Ala., In presenting this petition the undersigned beg leave to submit the following facts as the grounds upon which they confidently hope for favorable action:

In 1828 Congress officially recognized the prospective value of the Warrior coal-field and the importance of preserving it free from monopoly by enacting that the "Black Warrior River in the State of Alabama shall be forever free from toll for all property belonging to the United States and for all persons in their service, and for all citizens of the United States except as to such tolls as may be allowed by act of Congress." (Section 5244 Revised Statutes.)

The work of improving the Warrior River below Tuscaloosa has been in progress for several years, and there is now, for at least seven months in the year, from Tuscaloosa to the Gulf, a river navigable for towboats and barges. But above Tuscaloosa, where the coal-measures begin, the river is not at present navigable, and the act of Congress above cited effectually prevents private enterprise acting under State charters from undertaking its improvement, and thus utilizing the work already done and to be done on the river below.

When the act of 1828 was passed the coal-beds of the Warrior were entirely undeveloped, and remained so until recent years, except that at irregular intervals trifling amounts of coal were boated down the river during the brief and hazardous periods of navigation afforded by floods. In 1873 railroads entered the Warrior Valley, and in 1883 over 1,000,000 tons of coal were mined. The coal business of the Warrior Valley is, then, no longer prospective; it exists, and has reached such proportions that the undersigned feel justified in urging Congress to open the natural outlet for this large and increasing business.

At present such of the Warrior coal as reaches the Gulf at Mobile is subject to a railroad haul of over two hundred and fifty miles and a transportation charge of $2.10 per ton. It is supplied to vessels at the price of $3.75 per ton as against $8 to $12 per ton as late as 1878, so that, even while burdened with the heavy cost of rail transportation, the saving to the Government in the cost of coal furnished to revenue-cutters and other Government steamers has, as stated by Collector Burke, of Mobile, amounted to $40,000 in the past three years.

The cost of coal transportation by river to Mobile is estimated at 50 cents per ton. (Report of Chief of Engineers for 1881, page 1203.) Hence the cost of coal delivered by river at the Gulf would not exceed $2.15, on the supposition that it would be reduced by the whole amount saved in transportation charges, a supposition reasonable enough, since on a river free from tolls competition would have full play. According to the prices-current quoted by the Coal Trade Journal of January 2, 1884, the lowest quotations for bituminous coal (similar to the Warrior coal) at the chief coal ports on the Atlantic coast were as follows: At New York, $3.75 per ton; at Philadelphia, $3.50 per ton; at Baltimore, $3 per ton.

From this it will be seen that by opening the Warrior to the coal trade a coal station will be established on the Gulf where supplies can be had at a cheaper rate than at any other point on the seaboard. The commercial results ensuing therefrom would be widespread and indirectly of national importance, especially in view of the large amount of coal that will be required at the Panama Canal.

But aside from all this, as stated in report of Chief of Engineers for 1875, volume 2, page 27, "in case of a war with a maritime power the value to the Government of a coaling station on the Gulf that can be readily and cheaply supplied at all times, without incurring the risk of sea transportation, can be readily understood;" and, it might be added, would amply justify the Government in encountering the expense of improving the Warrior.

Believing from the facts above set forth that the time has arrived for Congress to fulfill its pledge to improve the Warrior, virtually implied in the act of 1828, which in effect nationalized that stream, the undersigned respectfully urge the favorable consideration of Congress upon this their petition.

[SEAL.] W. C. JEMISON, Mayor, Tuscaloosa.
A. P. HOGAN, Secretary.

Mr. SHELLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Whereas under a certain rule of naturalization made on the 14th of December, 1882, by a delegate of the Secretary of State of the United States and a delegate of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the King of Spain in the United States, two citizens of the United States have been denationalized, and the judgments of the courts which admitted them to be citizens of the United States have been set aside and vacated; and

Whereas it appears that the so-called new rule of naturalization has been used as a precedent in the international tribunal now sitting in Washington under the name of United States and French Commission, and the United States have been condemned to pay indemnification to certain claimants who were born in France, but were naturalized in the United States, and have alleged that their naturalization was obtained by them "through misrepresentation of material facts," and have therefore been benefited, to the detriment of the United States, by their own acknowledged frauds: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House a copy of the letters of instructions of the Secretary of State, Mr. William M. Evarts, to the advocate of the United States, Mr. Thomas J. Durant, dated March 7, 1879; of the letters of instructions of the Secretary of State, Mr. James G. Blaine, to the same advocate of the United States, Mr. Thomas J. Durant, dated April 22 and November 30, 1881; of the so-called new rule of naturalization made by the two delegates above named on December 14, 1882; of the decisions of December 26, 1882, written by Mr. James Lowndes, of South Carolina, and concurred in by Marquis Potestad Forrari, in the cases of José Garcia de Angarica, No. 13, and of Ramon Fernandez Criado y Gomez, No. 29 on the docket of the late United States and Spanish Commission; and of the decisions rendered by the United States and French Commission in the two cases of David Kohnagel vs. The United States, marked, respectively, Nos. 438 and 533 on the docket of that commission.

The SPEAKER. This bill should be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. DUNN. I think it had better go the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the proper reference would be to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. DUNN. There is involved in it a rather intricate question of law which I think the Committee on the Judiciary had better pass upon. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.
